

RELIGION: TRUE AND FALSE

Greetings, my dearest friends. Welcome back, all of you! Blessings for all of you. Blessed is this coming working season and every facet of it.

Before I turn to tonight's lecture, I should like to address a few words first of all to those of my friends who are on the real path; who really search diligently within themselves; who undertake this very intensive program of finding and knowing themselves and are thereby able to change and grow into happier human beings. For you, this promises to be an exceedingly important year. How much you can accomplish will of course depend on you. But the time now is ripe, after all the previous work, for giving you better tools to work with, so to speak. And if you do your utmost to encounter yourself with utter candor, you can derive the maximum of benefit in this coming year. Particularly beneficial will be the combination of group and private work; steadily developing and growing according to your needs and capacity will prove more and more indispensable.

For those of my friends who are on a less intensified self-search, but who nevertheless strive to some degree by hearing and reading these lectures, by thinking about some portion of what they learn, and by trying to apply it to themselves, they too will also find this a fruitful year -- certainly not to the same degree as the others who really work regularly and with help. But they may, nevertheless, gain some insights and clarifications, provided that they are truly willing.

So let us all together generate the intent to cooperate with one another, to understand one another, to understand ourselves, and to really make this year provide a crucial steppingstone on the path. The material you have absorbed, the work that you have accomplished in the past, will make you ready for that which is to come.

And now, my friends, to our lecture. This first lecture of the season will deal with the topic of religion, true and false. Some of what I say will not be altogether new, but you will be able to understand and apply it on a deeper level. But most of that which is not new for you, you know only in your intellect, while your emotions still deviate to a great extent from the outer knowledge you have. To determine this deviation will be an important part of the work to come.

Divine effort throughout the ages of mankind's existence has always gone into the direction of conveying and bringing true religion to man. But along with that very endeavor, there came into existence the unavoidable counterreaction. This is not so much antireligion, as you may believe, but false religion. The distortion of the truth comes under the guise that the falsity is truth. If you follow the history of religion, you will be able to determine a very obvious trend, but with many a relapse, gradually yet surely from the false into the true. Particularly in recent times, in spite of and maybe just because of all the upheaval and confusion, the trend is more strongly than ever toward true religion.

What are the main differences between true and false religion? One of the main determinants is the following concept. In false religion, obedience to authority is one of the great strongholds. In all religions (in some more, and in some less), the concept of obedience plays an important role. True religion does not obey. It is free. True religion is a willing process, a free, self-determined action, derived out of understanding. It makes the person act out of his own full conviction and never out of fear nor out of the desire to please and appease a more powerful person, being, or authority.

Obedience to authority has been encouraged by exponents of religion under the half-truth and only partly valid argument that mankind was too undeveloped in its passions to let it be free. Hence, in order to protect society, the obedience concept had to be introduced and stressed. Superficially, this may seem right. In reality, it is not. For although it is true that the general overall development of mankind is not advanced far enough to be free of destructive impulses, laws to prevent such destruction need not be combined with religion. In other words, religion would not have to convey the idea of a stern, severe God-authority in order to prevent crime. There are other means for that through civil law. Religion need not be distorted and truth prevented by encouraging man's weakest, sickest, and most immature trends. Those trends are exploited in order to maintain false religion.

Due to your work on this path, by now you all know that one of the great struggles that your consciousness has to go through in opposition to your unconscious tendencies is the desire (unconscious) to remain a clinging, protected child, to refuse the apparent hardship of adulthood, self-responsibility, and independence. To the child in you, it seems a much better arrangement to remain helpless so as to "force" the powerful adult world or God or any substitute for these two to take on the responsibility for your life that you, yourself, should carry. The tremendously damaging effects that this hidden attitude has on the personality can only be discovered as this process attains full awareness. But unconsciously you battle against this very awareness in the wishful thinking (unconscious) that the disadvantages of adulthood can be avoided by retaining the wish to be a child, while refusing to face the tragic disadvantages of enforced and prolonged childhood. This soul crippling attitude finally succeeds in really making you helpless and weak, while the God-authority you desire to take over your responsibility just is not there. This in turn causes bitterness, rebellion, and a deep feeling of injustice because you feel cheated. After all, you have obeyed, often to the letter. But in obedience of this sort, there is always the wrong motive: "If I obey, you will protect me. You will make decisions for me. I will not be held responsible, and I will be rewarded with happiness for being an obedient little child." Since God does not "reward" such unhealthy attitudes, you must feel cheated. You cannot help but feel injustice in the world.

False religion has encouraged this very sick tendency in man and is capitalizing on it. It has set up rules and dogmas and has distorted the law into such a rigid concept that man fell easily into this very attitude that religious authority requested of him. It encouraged his fear, dependency, helplessness, and fostered a humiliating, though often very subtle, tendency of appeasement. This has the additional crippling effect of causing self-contempt and shame, which in turn often has to find outlets that become destructive towards others as well as to the self. Rebellion must follow this set of emotions.

Whenever you see in a personality the predominant attitude of fear, timidity, nonassertion, appeasement, obedience, then rebellion must exist also. It may not be on the surface, but exist it must! There can be no doubt about it. It will be quite a battle to find this level of rebellion, bitterness, hostility, and aggressive tendencies. This battle is caused by the resistance to give up the cherished self-image of the "good" person. This need for such "goodness" is mostly determined by the above-mentioned hidden striving to remain a helpless child so as to make the grown-up world (God or life or human authority) see the necessity of taking care of the child. And the child only "deserves" such benign care if it maintains its "goodness."

By the same token, if you encounter in a human being a predominant rebellion, overemphasis on independence to an exaggerated degree of separateness, isolation, hostile domineering tendencies, toughness, denial of all laws and rules, you may be certain that to the degree in which all these emotional attitudes exist, to the same degree will fear, cringing appeasement, and helplessness also exist. But in this case, the latter attitude is hidden from sight and awareness. The shame of it is so great that the outer personality takes on the falsity of freedom and independence that is a poor imitation of the real. Because the personality wishes so strongly to avoid the struggle of life, he cringes like the predominantly fearful and appeasing type, but is ashamed of this desire, this weakness, as well as of the disappointment of not getting his will. He unconsciously feels himself alone. Of all people, he is rejected by God or life or by human authority, and this shame has to be hidden at all costs.

Both these crass types -- often appearing in less crass mixtures and combinations -- represent, of course, psychological deviations that can always be traced to parental influences and early experiences. However, it is also important to consider these manifestations from the spiritual and religious point of view. Complete awareness and understanding of these attitudes, with all their chain reactions and by-products, will show you how you inwardly deviate from your conscious belief.

So where there is outer religious faith, obedience, and appeasement, try to find not only the clinging helplessness, but also the hidden resentment that God has not come forth to provide you with what you need and want, to lead you by the hand, to make life right for you, to eliminate from this earth cruelty and injustice, suffering and pain. Such general complaints are often motivated by the inner subjective disappointment of not being "taken care of."

And when you find manifest rebellion and aggressiveness, a drive for overindependence, do try to find where there is deep down in you your wish for the strong hand of a leading authority that is utterly good to you, and your disappointment that you could not find it.

It will be a part of your task in self-search to ascertain where false religion exists deep in your soul, where you borrow, as it were, religious precepts under which you hide and excuse your childish tendencies of refusal to grow up.

Your conscious right opinions are worth very little when, in your entire being, you are not penetrated by these right opinions. If you do not live, experience, and feel these right ideas, your correct thoughts are powerless. They are like an empty shell. Only where belief and opinion are incorporated in the emotional nature, in the whole character structure, will these beliefs have power. Whenever you wonder why a certain thing may happen to you while you are convinced of the depth of your right thinking, of the spiritual laws you know so well; you can be sure that, at least in some respect, inwardly you must deviate. And it will be your task to find in what way, in what respect, and to what degree you deviate from your correct conscious opinions in your being, in your feeling, and therefore in your inner and outer actions. While you may know perfectly well that God is neither a benign nor a hostile authority, that God has let us free and it is up to us to develop; yet underneath you may often find that your emotions completely deviate from such knowledge.

It is not only those problems that you carry through many incarnations, not only the life circumstances of your childhood environment and of your parents that are instrumental in bringing these conflicts to the surface, but it is also the general trend of religion that encourages the misleading concept of obedience -- often even blind obedience. This then takes the effect of predominant helplessness, false goodness, and appeasement; or of predominant overindependence, rebellion, and false toughness; or a combination of both. In both instances, you hide something and ardently try to prove to yourself and to others that the hidden does not exist. In one case, you hide the rebellion and hostility; in the other case, you hide the helplessness and desire for protection, this tendency to appease and be "good."

By finding, tracing, understanding, and resolving these distortions, you not only grow up and become strong and an infinitely happier human being, but you also contribute much more than you can possibly perceive, at the moment, towards the elimination of false religion and the growth of real religion in the world at large.

This obedience concept, as false religion encourages and teaches it, could not possibly be compatible with the idea of a free human being, who alone can reach divinity. If blind obedience is taken out of the soul of religion and of the individual, rebellion against that which is truly good, wise, and loving will cease because it will lose that tinge of hypocrisy, of goody-goodyness, of falsehood that it so often seems to have for a number of individuals. True religion, genuine spirituality, has as its primary aim to make man free, to make him strong, not weak and helpless, to make him self-responsible not by waiting for justice to be dished out to him, but by making his own justice. In the wrong attitude, you not only do not eliminate your self-imposed helplessness, but you encourage it and encourage also false religion -- even if helpless weakness and clinging to authority happens to take a consciously nonreligious form. Thus you must see that such immaturity and soul deviations play hand in hand with false religion. And anything false always brings an equally false countermeasure and extreme.

So, find in what subtle, deeply hidden recesses of your soul you expect God to live for you; to make decisions for you; to bring desired results for you; to give unto you what you could get for yourself if only you decide to become a free, mature, human being. See this element in you that is more harmful than you can possibly know at this moment. With this hidden attitude, you cripple yourself. And you make out of the truth a false crutch.

Religion in its falsity is more harmful to true religion than complete atheism and materialism because it makes a farce out of truth, of the dignity of a free divine human being, and of the divine strength in man. It puts a right argument into the mouths of the antireligionist. So it becomes very important that you find wherein you persist and go on clinging because you are afraid of standing on your own feet. You may at first wonder how to go about finding this element in you. I say it does not matter where you begin if you focus your outlook on this goal. Take any negative emotion -- envy, bitterness, fear, helplessness, and most indicative of all, self-pity. Once you ascertain these feelings, it will not be so difficult to find the persistence that keeps you in spiritual and emotional infancy. Set out to search in this direction even if you happen to be convinced that it does not apply to you. If you really want to find it, you will. You always have. Once you have found this element of unconscious insistence to remain a helpless child, you will soon come to see that this is responsible for your weakness, your helplessness, your thus ensuing fear of life. But you combat this by even making yourself even more helpless, more fearful, and weaker. Once you truly see and understand this, you will begin to change. And strength will grow out of you. You will no longer hope for God to give you what you should and could be strong enough to obtain yourself. And this will give you self-respect and security. While you cling to a stronger authority than yourself in order to avoid effort and responsibility, you cannot help feeling self-hate and self-contempt. You become weaker and more helpless.

This authority can take the form of a vague sense of the world at large which has to be appeased, of life in general, or of fate. Emotionally, it can apply to certain people, or it can actually be your concept of God. This then leads to the God image that I discussed quite a while ago. The very outcome of false religion, on the one hand, and your unconscious insistence on remaining an infant, on the other, produce this God image.

In the transitory state between false religion and true religion, there comes a phase of nothingness. It is a difficult phase indeed. It is a phase in which you feel alone because the false god is dissolving and the true God could not really take hold of your being as yet. In this phase, all your faith may begin to crumble. You may be full of doubts about the existence of God altogether. All this is due to eliminating the false security, the escape, the crutch that are all part of spiritual infancy. Since your childish concept of God does indeed not exist, God seems temporarily not to exist at all.

But as the false religious concept with its God image vanishes, even while you find yourself in a temporarily painful state of aloneness, an inner force begins to grow in you long before you become aware of it -- provided, of course, you are not thrown by this temporary state, but go on working with renewed effort. You have to be willing to take it upon yourself to become whole, strong, and self-reliant. You have to determine not to allow this temporary state to crush you and to abdicate life and all struggle. If you fall into such a state, you cannot come out a free, strong individual, but you may again fall back into the misleading, shallow comfort of false religion. If you develop your own strength for the very reason that you feel alone, then you will be victorious, and the road to true religion will be paved by your own attitude and effort. Only in that way can you let go of the phantom hand and of the phantom god, and develop the real God freedom within after you have gone through this lowest point on the curve -- that of accepting aloneness. Such acceptance of the right kind will strengthen the independence and self-responsibility that are essential to the God creature that you wish to become.

If you really understand these words, not only intellectually and superficially, but after you have worked for a while and have come across corresponding currents, trends, and reactions, you will understand two things a lot better than heretofore.

One is the lecture about duality: the acceptance of death, of the unknown with all its facets, this being the only prerequisite for acceptance of life and happiness; not the acceptance of death with a wishful thinking spirituality, by avoiding the facing of your fear and your doubt; not by using religion as a crutch to whisk away this fear and aloneness, but by bravely encountering it, by taking it out of repression. Only then can true religion and knowledge replace the false religion of escape and a vague belief serving only to cover up your fear.

There exists in this respect a mutuality. Accepting death and the unknown is connected with acceptance of independence and of self-responsibility. Both indicate spiritual and emotional adulthood, freedom, growth, creativity, strength, trust in the self, real security! In false religion, the emotional climate is: "I am a weak helpless sinner. I can do nothing without God, without an authority who permits me to be happy. This God has the right to be good or bad to me. But if I obey and appease, chances are that he will be well disposed towards me, or so I hope."

From humiliation, you will develop a humility. From clinging appeasement and blind obedience -- often without understanding -- you will develop into a strong self-responsible being, trusting in your own capacity to obtain what you need in life. You need the courage now of letting go of the illusion of the false religion, of false consolation. And in this transitory state, if you go through it, the strength will come out of the truth.

The second point you will also understand better is the reason why the emphasis of my lectures for quite some time was more on the psychological rather than on the spiritual. And this will still occur quite often. For none of you is free of the role that spirituality plays in the distortion of your being -- namely, escape as a substitute for your own weakness, as a consolation for your fears, as a hope of appeasing God so that He may give you what you could easily obtain by your own efforts if you but find that which paralyzes them. When religion is a substitute, it may for a while be a help. It may assuage unreasonable fear. But in the long run, it cripples you and all your powers of growth. That is why I sometimes have to stay away from truth because your subconscious would misuse and misunderstand it. But the more that these problems become resolved, the safer will it be to give you truth without the danger of weakening you. Then true religion will come out of your own strength, not out of a superimposition. It will come from within and not, as you now unconsciously expect, from without. The fact that you develop your own resources and strength instead of obtaining them from a being outside of yourself does not make it any less divine -- quite the contrary. With this understanding, you will not mind, sporadically, the return to periods of a more psychological approach. But again and again, we will return to the spiritual approach to see where the psychological deviations, the images, the distortions, the wrong conclusions, and false solutions are in direct contradiction to the spirituality that all of you aim for. Then and then only will you fully understand that these are not two unrelated subjects, but one is an integral part of the other.

Now, my friends, are there any questions regarding this topic?

QUESTION: Could you explain what is true religion, as compared to the wrong attitude? Where does the belief in God come in if you don't feel He is a help? I just don't quite follow this.

ANSWER: You will feel that God is a help when you come to true religion, after abandoning the crutch, but in a completely different sense. Now you need God's help because you make yourself helpless. Then you will feel God's help because you will perceive the perfection of the universe and its laws, the strength of them, of which you are an integral, contributing part. You will feel that you are the driving force of your life. You can help yourself if you really want to, if you are ready to sacrifice something. Let us say, you want a happiness in a certain direction -- and this is not some vague feeling, but a clearly defined goal. You will seek and find in what way you have so far prevented this happiness, and what you can now do to obtain it by your own endeavors. You will understand what this demands of you, and it will be up to you to either fulfill these demands because you decide it is worthwhile, or you will abstain from it. But then there will not be a gnawing feeling in your soul that you are a neglected and unjustly treated child. This is spiritual and emotional maturity, and true religion. God's role is not to provide you with things you do not wish to obtain for yourself. But the God consciousness is that His world is so wonderful that you have so much more power than you have heretofore realized if only you set it in motion, if you remove your own obstacles, blocks, greed, laziness, cowardice.

The false religious attitude is when you ask God to help you to overcome a hardship in your life, and then you sit down and wait. You do not examine sufficiently why you have this hardship. You may do so peremptorily because someone else in an authoritative place has told you to do so. But even while you attempt this examination, there is always an inner direction of proving that in this case you have nothing to do with the hardship. It has just fallen upon you undeservedly, and there is no way of getting out of it unless God commits an act of grace. But there is no inner will and stamina to find how you can really get what you want out of your own creativity. God is in you. The divine forces are in you if you mobilize them rather than wait for them from the outside. And the mobilization of these forces can only happen if you let go of some damaging attitude, something destructive that, again, is up to you to find. The strength and security coming from this attitude will give you an entirely different relationship to God, and an entirely different concept. Emotionally, the concept and the inner climate will be different. The words may often remain the same. The words are often the same for the true and the false religion. But the inner experience is entirely different. In both the false and the true religion, you can say that God's grace exists. Even though you are on your own, the grace also exists. But the understanding of this will not come before you put yourself on your own. As long as you expect God's grace to make up for your human laziness and greed, you must be disappointed whether or not you admit this to yourself. So you become hurt and angry and rebellious. You then either turn away from God altogether, denying His very existence in the universe; or you consider yourself an isolated case of neglect, partly unworthy of His grace and help and partly unjustly treated. So you thrive in guilt and self-pity. This makes you more dependent and helpless. And so the vicious circle continues in atoning for your rebellion against God by appeasing Him even more with fearful obedience that is entirely on the surface and caused by the sickest motivations.

QUESTION: I understand. But how can we go about it? This God image is so imbedded in us since so many decades of false attitude. Wouldn't it mean that if we go away from this concept, the prayer would change too? The whole attitude would change? Everything would change?

ANSWER: Yes, of course. But you see, my child, you cannot say, "Now I will go away from my God image." It is not something you can decide in your mind. It does not work that way. The emotional impact of it would remain if you try to change it by a mere outer decision. In order to make the inner decision, the procedure has to be the same as it has always been in this work. The way to go about it is to find these attitudes and to understand them more deeply and fully. If this is really done, not just superficially, you will all have a surprise in finding to what preposterous means you have gone in order to forcefully maintain infanthood, and for what specific reasons. Once you analyze and understand certain emotional behavior patterns, you will realize how preposterous they are, how incompatible with your conscious belief, how contrary to your own best interests, how logically impossible because they are always mutually in conflict with contrary trends. After seeing and understanding all this, the change happens organically, by itself, as it were. A certain length of time of self-observation is necessary in order to gain full insight and then to be able to change. You cannot begin by saying, "Now I shall get rid of my God image." The only way is to find these subtle and unobtrusive emotional reactions. They are not obvious nor strong. Nor are they completely unconscious. They are there, but so subtle, and you are so used to them that you do not even see anything amiss. To find them and analyze them is the first step, and then to see them in the light of this discussion is next. This will help to eliminate and dissolve the God image because your attitude will naturally change. You will, for instance, find what your expectations really are, how you inwardly complain. You will find what you yourself do in order to make these expectations a reality, and you will get to understand why you did not do so. This should be the procedure.

The very fact that you are aware of this God image is extremely favorable for you because many others are not aware of it at all. They are convinced they do not have any distortion in this respect. They do not connect certain emotional reactions with this God image, with the false religious attitude. They are filled with their conscious right belief, while their unconscious concepts are still too far away from awareness.

QUESTION: What religion is farthest away from the truth?

ANSWER: You cannot say that. One cannot make such a statement. It may be that one religious denomination has more truthful teaching, but the other which has fewer may, in its overall attitude, be closer to truth. Apart from the fact that it would be dangerous to draw such comparisons, it is not important.

QUESTION: One of the last words of Christ was, "Father, Thy will be done." Taken as an example, this could have been obedience, or it could have been freedom.

ANSWER: Exactly. As I said before, the words are often the same. Truth can so easily be misinterpreted because the essence of truth is in the willingness and capacity to understand. For example, by what I discussed tonight, you could easily say there can be no grace of God. If man is supposed to be free and independent, how does grace come in? He would not even need it. This is not true. Grace does exist. But no words can convey the truth of the concept of grace unless you have first reached this inner true religious experience. When you no longer need grace as a substitute for your own weakness, when you do not make an asset out of your weakness, then will you first become strong. For a while, you will at first live without any understanding of grace. But then the true grace concept will dawn upon you. In other words, this interim state of aloneness has first to be gone through. The great mystics designate it as the "dark night."

The saying you just mentioned, "Thy will be done," rightly understood means, "I let go of my small self-will, of my limited outlook, and I open myself so that the Divine can come to me." It will not come from without but from within as a deep knowledge and certainty, but you will not disassociate yourself from this realization. It will not be a question for you of "either me or God." Both will be one, but this can only happen if you learn to let go, if you cease to be rigid. This is the true meaning. The false meaning of this saying makes man weak, stupid, and inescapable so that he needs another being to act instead of him, to decide instead of him. This other being is then often human authority or Church authority which claims to act on behalf of God. "Thy will be done" does not mean obedience. It means opening yourself to the fullest possible extent so that the greater wisdom will become a part of yourself.

QUESTION: From what you say, it becomes clear that religion is a matter of the development of each individual soul to its optimum point through growth by way of search and self-realization. However, the churches have played a dominant role for many years. It would seem therefore that the church function will eventually fall away.

ANSWER: Yes, indeed it will. When more people follow a path of self-recognition, of growing, and of developing their own resources, they will not any longer need authority. And for those who are then not far enough in their development, human law will suffice to protect society from the untamed and destructive elements. The truly divine can only function in free souls, and this will happen. The whole trend of history points in this direction.

QUESTION: You told us about companionship and interrelationship. At times, one has to be alone. What is the right and wrong kind?

ANSWER: There is a simple answer to that, although not easily detectable. When you investigate your emotional reactions and you want companionship out of fear of being alone, then the need for companionship springs, at least partly, from a wrong motive. If you want aloneness out of a fear to involve yourself, a fear of people because the withdrawing aspect in you is rather strong, then striving for aloneness springs, again at least partly, from a wrong motive. In other words, both can be healthy as well as unhealthy. An integrated human being needs both, and both for constructive reasons, rather than in order to avoid something he fears. The answer which holds true can only come from ardent self-examination.

More and more, you will see that truth cannot be stated as a rigid law. It always depends on how you feel and what the underlying motivations are.

QUESTION: I try to form words to express my inner conflicts. The words seem exaggerated. How can I keep my words level with that which I find in my search?

ANSWER: First of all, you will have to understand better the reason for this exaggeration and dramatization of yourself. Once you understand that, the need will lessen. There will be a more proportionate relationship between the one and the other. Again, the remedy is not to use self-discipline to stop this. Even if you should succeed, another (perhaps more harmful) symptom will come forth. Rather, use such manifestations as the useful symptoms that they are.

QUESTION: Can I do it in trying to evaluate the words?

ANSWER: Certainly. That would be part of your private work -- what words you use and why.

QUESTION: Very often it is very easy for one subconscious to talk to another. But there are times when there exists such a strong barrier that you cannot penetrate. The other person asks for the answer, yet he doesn't listen, and you can't reach him.

ANSWER: The person who asks the question wants only a qualified answer. That is, he wants an answer compatible with his defenses. He does not want an answer that he finds unpleasant. This causes an inner resistance so strong that he cannot hear. He cannot absorb what is being said to him. The attitude towards a person in this frame of mind is not to try to force the issue. The more that inner force exists in you to penetrate the resistance, the more will you feel frustration and impatience. And this is bound to affect the other and increase the resistance even more. Moreover, it will be extremely useful to analyze the reason for your own frustration and impatience. It may be more than the good will to help. In some way, your capacity may seem to be involved. Or the acceptance of the truth may have an urgency for you that is not realistic. Whenever such currents exist, a mutually negative effect is established that worsens the inner problems in both. But finding what inner hidden role you play so that this could become a problem for you will be more than useful and beneficial, possibly even for both parties. If there were no negative or problematic tendencies in yourself, you could easily accept another person's limitation. You know that. Now, this is a general answer, applying to many.

If there is anything unclear regarding what I discussed tonight, I will be only too glad to elaborate on it next time. May this first lecture of the year not only give you food for thought, but may it also be instrumental in bringing out certain feelings that you have not been aware of. May these words cause emotional echoes in you. As you let this lecture take effect on you, it will stir up so much! This is good. I go from you with all our blessings for the coming year, for the work that is before you. Yes, help is given unto you, but do try to recognize where, somehow, you will conceive of help as being an outside factor not having much to do with your own endeavors and strivings and not as something that you mobilize first of all in yourself.

With this, my dearest ones, be blessed! Love and peace unto all of you. Be in God!
