

REPPRESSED NEEDS, RELINQUISHING BLIND NEEDS, PRIMARY AND SECONDARY REACTIONS

Greetings, my dearest friends. God bless each one of you. God bless this hour.

We began to discuss needs, but we touched only the very surface of this all-important subject. So let us go into it a little more thoroughly. For, understanding of the significance of needs and becoming aware of them will be more than mere enlightenment and insight. It will show you that in connection with repressed needs, along with your unawareness of them, you will find all the twists and unresolved conflicts within your soul -- and therefore in your life. So this phase of your work carries us a great deal further and deeper than the images with their wrong conclusions.

Basically, there are two kinds of needs: the instinctual needs and those of the idealized self-image. Instinctual needs derive from the two basic instincts of self-preservation and procreation. These needs can be very healthy and normal. However, if repressed, they will turn into potent forces of destruction. It is not necessarily only the false and imaginary needs that are destructive. A need that in itself is healthy and normal can be destructive where awareness of it is repressed or nonexistent. Among the needs of the idealized self are, for instance, the need for glory, the need to triumph, the need to satisfy vanity or pride. In order to understand this particular process, you have to review how the idealized self-image came into existence.

These two kinds of needs often intermingle and fuse so that you are no longer aware -- even unconsciously aware, if I may use this seeming paradox -- of what is a healthy and legitimate need and what is not. They intertwine and overlap. Not only do the superimposed, unhealthy, and artificially created needs of the idealized self create guilt feelings; but, just as often, the healthy, normal, and legitimate needs of every healthy human being cause equally strong guilt feelings. Often, this is due to the influence of environment, to distorted mass images, and to mass misconceptions. Your ignorance and the ignorance of educators and parents have created a distorted view that induces you to repress and to subdue what should be encouraged in a constructive way. This general ignorance fails to recognize that which is intrinsically human and even necessary.

Once you free yourself of resistance and repression, it will be a great relief to recognize that often that which you felt most guilty about is not only normal and healthy, but is in fact often most creative. Because of these misconceptions, you have deliberately starved such needs. Due to such starvation, they cannot disappear, but by a process of displacement, they reappear in a destructive way so that you unconsciously try to gratify their insistent claim in a manner that cannot do justice to their real demands. The driving force to still the hunger is misdirected. Proper direction and adequate strivings to gratify real, legitimate needs can occur only if full awareness exists so that intelligence can combine with the instinctual forces.

Your misconception about this subject produces repression and subsequently a defense mechanism, which is so very destructive. Some of my friends have had occasion to begin to get a glimpse of it. You may ask, "What does the defense mechanism have to do with this?" Well, the answer is that repressed needs cause you to act contrary to your own best interests so as to gratify these needs. Therefore your actions produce experiences that starve these needs even more. Since this hurts, you will produce a defense against such hurts that is even more contrary to the fulfillment you crave.

This plainly shows the direction of your work now. This entire process has to be unrolled and brought into awareness. Only then will you be able to develop a more adequate behavior pattern that promises to bring the result you wish and which is nothing to be ashamed of merely because it brings happiness and fulfillment. Thus you may see that your defense mechanism exists not only because you fear the risks of life, love, and involvement, but also because of your mistaken idea that certain needs are forbidden and wrong. So do you also defend against the needs in yourself. I am talking not only about what is already commonly known in this respect -- sexual needs. It goes a lot further. Humanity has by now learned that sexual needs do not have to be repressed. They are not in themselves harmful and sinful. But it has not as yet realized that many other needs also exist that have experienced a treatment similar to that put upon the sexual needs. These other needs, reaching into a deeper realm of humanity, have to be brought out, acknowledged, and properly directed as has already been done, to a degree, with the sexual needs.

As already stated, if your needs are repressed, the urge for gratification becomes much stronger. This is logical because awareness of a need and the clear knowledge of it will enable you to cope with it in the manner most appropriate under the particular circumstances. It will enable you to make a choice, to relinquish one thing in order eventually to obtain what is more rewarding for you. The ability to relinquish in that way indicates maturity. On the other hand, repression, causing blind needs and blind pursuit of them, makes it impossible to see the issues involved. Therefore you cannot act to your own best interest. To know where to relinquish may be necessary in order to receive greater fulfillment, but you cannot, in certain circumstances, do so because you do not see it. The pressing need causes you to hold tight to that which you can get but which is often utterly inadequate. This unawareness and blindness encourages the childish greed of attempting immediate fulfillment all along the line. If this proves impossible, frustration is unbearable, and you find yourself trapped, caught in your own vicious circle of continuing to do what is against your interest. Only awareness of your needs will enable you to stand temporary frustration, if it is necessary, if it cannot be helped. You will be capable of relinquishing the immediate urgency for gratification in the far-sighted knowledge that, in so doing, you will serve the interests of your healthy needs, if not right now, then at a future time. You make this choice freely due to awareness.

Unawareness of your needs and unconscious guilt and belief that they are wrong freezes them into a hard knot, and the urgency of gratification makes it impossible to stand frustration, which is one of the marks of immaturity. This lack of gratification confirms to you that you are wrong in having the need. This drives awareness even more into hiding and causes you to be driven into the pursuit of gratification. With this castigation, the urgency becomes even more potent and therefore more difficult to handle.

Now comes into existence the apparently paradoxical situation wherein awareness of one's needs and their legitimacy makes it possible to pursue their gratification. And in order to do so, frustration sometimes becomes a necessary factor that can be endured. On the other hand, unawareness and repression create such an urgency that the immature, unconscious condition prevails in which you cannot stand frustration. You cannot relinquish even the slightest point, and, you thereby sabotage the possibility of fulfilling your needs.

Offhand, this may be very difficult to understand, for it cannot be applied to specific factors. No general rules and regulations can be made. It can only be understood if and when you find this process within yourself, how it manifests specifically in your case. As you allow yourself awareness of the raw needs, their significance, their validity, their desired goal; you can then proceed to observe what you have done in the past to sabotage them, how you have done so, what the defense mechanisms are that have caused such sabotaging. Finally you will find one focal point, deep within yourself, where you discover that you ferociously hold on, that you cannot relinquish. And therefore you are locked and enslaved in what is called, in your present day human terminology, a neurotic situation. All neurosis is built around such a nucleus of repressed needs and the inability to give up a certain point for the purpose of gratification. This then causes the neurotic symptoms of helplessness, dependency, inability to make a choice, of seeing only two equally dissatisfying alternatives. You are torn in half in this very condition. If there were not one part in you that disapproves of these needs, you would not find it necessary to repress them. Hence, one part in you says no to them. And the more you say no, the more urgent they become, and the other part in you battles against the no and battles against the world that does not offer gratification gratuitously. Only your own wholehearted support and cooperation can induce you to undertake the necessary actions and behavior patterns that will finally bring a sufficient measure of fulfillment, even if not to the ideal extent of your childish fantasies. However, such actual realistic fulfillment will produce much greater happiness in spite of its lack of perfection as matched with the childish fantasies. This is in consequence of the strength and self-reliance you have acquired on the way, of the knowledge that it is up to you and not up to others, which will more than compensate for the difference between reality and illusion.

When you find the point in you where (so far) you could not relinquish, varies in time with each individual. Again, no generalization can or should be made. That would only mislead you and tempt you to seek the solution by an intellectual process, rather than, as I advocate again and again, by allowing your emotions to reach surface awareness and thereby finding the answers within yourself. Only by becoming aware of all this will you also find it possible to distinguish between the natural, healthy needs, and the artificially created needs of the superimposed idealized self-image. Only as you learn to maturely go about fulfilling the healthy, natural needs, will you, and to that degree, become capable of giving up the false needs. You cannot even initiate the attempt to forcefully stamp out these false needs. It would do no good. All you can and should do is become aware of them, on the one hand; while on the other, gradually learn to do what is realistic and adequate in order to fulfill the real needs. This in itself will automatically make the false needs disappear. First, slowly, their intensity will diminish, but gradually they will disappear altogether as real fulfillment comes to you out of your own healthy inner and therefore also outer activities. The false needs, even if here or there gratified, leave you empty and dissatisfied.

Wherever there exists this nucleus of division within, of repression and therefore self-destructive activities and undesired results, of being caught in a trap of inability to make a proper choice that would lead to constructive results, there prevails in the psyche a festering, twisted condition that leads to a host of further conflicts which finally manifest in an outer situation wherein you cannot cope with what confronts you. You cannot determine and make a choice. You are driven. And as within, so without, you see only two equally dissatisfying alternatives. And you are torn between them. On the one hand, you bow down to the needs, and by submitting, appeasing, complying, you become most angry with and contemptuous of yourself. On the other hand, you rebel against this very need to satisfy your needs. None of these two alternatives will bring a constructive result. In neither of these two alternatives have you found the point of relinquishing for the constructive end of eventually fulfilling your needs.

When this entire process reaches surface awareness, it is one of the most important steps on your road to freedom. Once you understand how you enslave yourself in this way, you will also become aware of your self-contempt. Unconsciously, you shifted this self-contempt to the existence of the needs. But you will find out, once all this reaches consciousness, that actually and in reality, there is no need for self-contempt because of the healthy needs. You will see that the real reason for self-contempt is your inner unwillingness to relinquish. And as you learn to do so, a new strength and self-respect will evolve that will be a great experience for you. At the beginning, it will only appear occasionally. But with each new victory, it will stay longer, and the relapses will become weaker and less frequent.

Moreover, as you find this subtle point of relinquishing, you will no longer be a slave to your needs just because you are now conscious of them and, further, because you can then go about finding the best way to bring fulfillment for yourself. The inability to relinquish is the most basic factor of your feelings of inferiority and inadequacy. The ability to relinquish will give you strength, self-confidence, and a healthy self-respect which nothing else on earth could give you. And just because this strength develops within, you can give up the false, distorted, super-imposed, artificial needs, and you can go about doing what is necessary, step by step, to obtain gratification for your real needs. But this self-respect must be established first. Without it, you are locked and blocked. And the destructive defense mechanism -- trying to do justice to two mutually exclusive drives, for and against gratification of the needs -- is largely a product of your self-contempt due to the inability to relinquish.

But beware of finding a quick answer as to what this point of relinquishing is. Do not take a particular surface desire and sacrifice it in the mistaken idea that here you have found it. This may be very misleading and simply encourage false self-sacrifice, defeatism, and self-destructiveness. Finding this point evolves only after a great deal of awareness of this process; and when it comes, you will feel so right about it. There will be no doubt in your mind. Most of all, there will be no sense of loss, of giving up something precious. You will not feel how "good" you are in doing so. But you will do so in the full knowledge of what you are doing and why you are doing it. You will want to do so because you fully understand that this serves your own interest, yet without being selfish. Only when such feelings accompany the point of relinquishing have you truly found it. Until then, you have to plow along in exploring your emotions, in bringing repressed needs to the surface, and in unrolling the inner process, while observing the subsequent outer actions and reactions.

When it comes to the subtleties of the human psyche, misunderstandings and misinterpretations are even more apt to occur than on the more superficial levels of human life. So beware of the false sacrifice which often substitutes for the real relinquishing, which never is a sacrifice. It is intelligent expediency, arrived at through fully facing a reality situation. If you relinquish something that is not yours to begin with anyway, you do not sacrifice. Hence you will not be led into the dangerous illusion of relinquishing something that could be yours -- and then feeling false self-satisfaction as opposed to real self-respect. The point of relinquishing simply means discovery of where your will power has no jurisdiction, and adjusting to that which is, while gathering your strength to do that which you can do. It means giving up only an illusion which you cling to out of your pressing unconscious need.

Do not let it bother you if some, or perhaps even most of you, at the moment are completely at sea when I talk about this point of relinquishing. It will come, slowly but surely, as you proceed in this work. For those who are not doing this work with the help of another, it may indeed be difficult to even remotely understand what I am talking about.

A further factor of this condition of repressed and mischanneled needs, with all the consequences that sap your energy, strength, and self-respect, is the ability to relate and to react. It is very obvious if you think about it. For the more urgent your needs are, while being unaware of them, the blinder you must be, the less capable you are of being alive and free in a reality situation and therefore of responding to the situation in an appropriate and adequate way. Such inadequate response cannot fail to set negative chain reactions in motion.

In this connection, we may speak of primary and secondary reactions. The healthier a psyche is; the more free is he of the condition we just discussed; the less enslavement exists; the more will he be capable of having primary reactions. By this, I mean the following. You will originally and spontaneously react to another person or a situation only if you are not caught in the trap of your own repressed needs with the ensuing negative condition as discussed here. If you are unable to stand frustration and to relinquish because you do not dare to face an unwelcome reality situation and cope with it, you cannot be spontaneous. You do not dare to consult your intuitive impressions which are so valuable. You are only encased in dependent waiting, and therefore your responses and reactions will be secondary ones. They will be based on what you think the reactions of others are towards you. Needless to say, this prohibits truth, spontaneity, and reality. In secondary reactions, you focus your inner, often unconscious attention solely on responding to what you believe exists, not to what actually exists. In primary reactions, being free of the illusion of hoping to bring gratification for repressed needs, you are capable of seeing what actually is.

The more repressed and therefore the more urgent your natural needs are, the more will you be in blindness, the more limited your outlook is bound to be. And therefore the more likely it is that you misjudge other people's reactions towards you -- for instance, in taking it for granted that you are hurt or rejected by another person when in reality no such thing exists. Unawareness of needs distorts reality in either direction. Everything is exaggeratedly good or bad, favorable or unfavorable. You are incapable of properly dealing with the situation, of evaluating people. You are only capable of experiencing secondary, conditioned responses. Even if they happen to be in truth, they are unreliable and will never give you a feeling of security. Only the capacity to experience primary, original, direct responses, brings out the intuitive reliable picture that is based on solid ground. It derives out of yourself, out of your own freedom, out of the ability to face and cope with a situation even if it is against your liking -- thus making you capable of relinquishing your illusion. Secondary reactions derive out of clinging to illusion and therefore not daring to see what actually is.

For example, if your need to be liked is so strong that you do not face the possibility that you may not be liked, then you are incapable of objectively and freely observing the situation, of finding out how it really is. You do not dare to allow yourself to like the other person until you are sure you are liked. If a liking for you transpires, only then you will like the other person. This is a secondary reaction. Your liking the other person may be in truth, but it may also be based on considerations that have nothing to do with reality. However, if you are free enough to cope with not being liked, you will simply see and react spontaneously on the ground of your observations uninfluenced by your need. Thus you have relinquished the pressing need to be liked for the sake of the truth of the situation. Only when you deal with this truth will you be in a position to do what is called for in order to fulfill your need. Either your free and spontaneous reactions will produce favorable circumstances for you so that you will be liked, or in your spontaneous, or primary reaction, seeing the truth, you will see that approval and liking by this particular person will yield you no gratification anyway, and you will be free to find a compatible person elsewhere. Whether this applies to a mate, to friends, to general human contact, makes no difference. Perhaps with this example, simple as it is, you will get a better idea of the process I am describing here.

The ability to have primary reactions is of utmost importance. The inability to have them comes from the repression of needs, the clinging to illusion because of it, and the subsequent inability to relinquish the illusion and to see the reality situation. At the same time, the absence of primary reactions strengthens your enslavement. You become more and more dependent on others; therefore you fear others. And the tragic thing is that your dependency is often hinged on completely illusory occurrences, factors, conditions. So you truly battle against something that does not exist and forfeit the chance of fulfilling your good and healthy needs. In order to do the latter, the freedom and strength of developing primary reactions are a necessary prerequisite. It has to be tackled from both ends. By making repressed emotions and needs more and more aware, you will uncover your persistence in clinging to illusion and hope, your not wishing to face reality, and your not wanting to relinquish a desired goal, be it only in the form of an illusion. This process will free you to develop primary reactions. On the other hand, by observing the fact that you respond only conditionally and not originally, when observed sufficiently, you will finally become capable of daring to react unconditionally, originally, and thus produce primary reactions. This will help you to face reality and relinquish illusion so as to be free for the pursuit of real fulfillment of your needs.

I realize, my friends, that this is not an easy lecture. For most of you, it will take quite a while to truly assimilate it. The better you advance in your personal work on this path, the sooner will this happen. And I am happy to observe that some of my friends are very close. But if now you but gain an inner realization, an inkling of understanding of some of my words, it will be of great help. In your work on the path, once you come across this inner condition with all the various aspects here described, it means more than another victory, and it will be a great step forward. It means that you are close to resolving a sick, distorted aspect of your soul that has brought you much unnecessary misery and frustration.

Are there any questions now?

QUESTION: How do you determine which is an artificial need and which is a natural need?

ANSWER: Let us suppose you discover a need to gratify your vanity. You know perfectly well this is not a necessity for living, or let us suppose a need to triumph over others. One can very well live without this. However, such discovery cannot and should not be used to moralize with yourself and force the need away. This would only lead to further repression. It requires you to find out why these needs exist. You are bound to find that a real and healthy need has been starved and the artificial one has taken its place. The fact that certain needs are false should not merely be accepted because I say so. The best way to determine the real from the false is to consider what the fulfillment of the need brings you and others. The fulfillment of a false need brings a shallow, temporary, short-lived gratification, often at the expense of another person or at the expense of a more urgent need of yourself. On the other hand, the fulfillment of a real need produces something very constructive for everyone concerned. Your gratification will also be constructive for others, and it will not hamper other important factors in your own personality. It is the outcome of growth and produces further growth, aside from the happiness and fulfillment.

When you discover an in itself healthy need, unhealthy factors have come into it when the awareness of the need has been repressed. This then causes the healthy need to get out of hand and become so strong in intensity that it becomes even more impossible to face reality, to cope with frustration, to relinquish illusion in connection with it. As you examine all these factors within yourself, you cannot help but become very much aware of which are constructive, healthy, real needs and which are not.

QUESTION: What about a strong need for harmony?

ANSWER: In itself, it is a healthy need. But if it becomes so strong that in order to gratify it, you forfeit, for instance, your equally healthy and legitimate need for self-assertion, independence, success, happiness, fulfillment -- all of which require a certain amount of healthy fighting spirit -- then there is something wrong, that is most harmful for you. You cling to the need for harmony, thus violating another essential part of your being, resulting in repression, discontent, anxiety, a sense of failure, of self-contempt. This is often exteriorated on others. As long as the need for harmony does not interfere with other needs, and you are capable of occasionally relinquishing the need for harmony in order to gratify the other needs, then everything is fine. Only you can be the judge as to whether or not this is so. In your further self-finding, you are bound to determine this and then go on from there.

QUESTION: When you touch upon these deep roots, when you are able to recognize what causes this complete twist in your psyche and how it manifests in many areas, and then this area becomes very rampant, you become ill, and you fight to survive this. How do you combat the severe reactions when you really get to these twists?

ANSWER: When there is such a strong reaction, such a negative experience, something in you still fights against giving it up. This must mean a part in you still believes that its existence provides you with some advantage or protection. Instead of forcing it away, rather set out to find in what respect you believe an advantage exists for you in maintaining the twisted condition, and in what way do you believe, in some part of your being, that its absence will be a disadvantage of some sort. Your battle, your severe reaction, is partly due to trying to force it away without understanding the irrational belief of advantage versus disadvantage. As long as such understanding is lacking, you must experience an extreme anxiety because the twisted condition has a function in your erroneous, unconscious belief. So set about finding it, and your battle will cease.

Due to ignoring this, you are temporarily unable to change. This makes you even more impatient with yourself. You want to speed yourself on in order to free yourself, yet you cannot do so without experiencing extreme discomfort. This impatience at the delay involves you in a battle with yourself which heightens the fear of giving up a precious "defense."

The impatience is caused to a large degree by the unconscious misconception that you have to be perfect in order to experience happiness and fulfillment. But this is not true, and some of my friends begin to find this out. Because of this misconception, you become quite frantic when you have discovered a distortion and are not yet able to let go of it because some further understanding is still missing. In this frantic state, it is even more difficult to discover the imagined disadvantage that makes you hold on to the condition in question.

QUESTION: When you begin to realize this deep frustration, this deep aggression you have, which is caused by the neurosis, you become ill before you are aware on a conscious level. You escape in many ways unconsciously in not facing that thing in you, that you feel destroys your whole structure. Once you do recognize it, it does go away to some degree, but then something else even deeper comes up, and you escape once more into this same illness. This is my problem. How do you break this pattern of escaping even into illness?

ANSWER: You mentioned that something even deeper comes up. In this instance, it is the answer of why you battle against giving up the sick, the erroneous solution -- whether it is illness or anything else that offers escape. As I said before, the imagined "advantage" of the false solution pushes to the surface, but the personality is afraid of facing it. Thus, the same process of overcoming resistance has to be gone through again. In this process, it often appears that one finds the same elements over and over. It is the spiral movement of evolution and development. As you proceed in this way, you will become aware of the escape and resistance at the moment it manifests, while previously you found it retrospectively. Such synchronization is the only indication of true progress. The negative manifestations do not just vanish after having once been discovered. They will reappear again and again as you observe them at work, with shorter and shorter intervals between occurrence and discovery, until the two synchronize and finally vanish. This is the spiral that becomes narrower and narrower until finally ending at one point. Ignorance of this process often causes distress because you may believe you have relapsed, and this makes you more impatient and more frantic and hopeless. But understanding of this will enable you to relax, to further observe, so that answers still hidden will come to the fore. These answers make it not only easier to narrow the gap between the wrong reactions that derive from the negative condition and its subsequent manifestations, but lead to finally giving up the twisted, damaging defense mechanism. Do you understand?

QUESTION: Yes, but it just seems so endless.....

ANSWER: No, it is not endless. The spiral movement becomes smaller and narrower, as I just said. But finally there comes a point when a change occurs within, almost as though by itself. A new reaction pattern becomes noticeable, which you started almost unknowingly, as it were. This is the result of long struggle, but if you do not let up and go again and again through the seemingly discouraging repetitions, each time finding the same anew, you will finally experience this automatic, spontaneous new reaction. It is never a forced and deliberate thing. If it is, it is not genuine.

QUESTION: When, for instance, you have a recognition that you can't be satisfied with second best while knowing this to be immature and realistic. But I can't feel different. It is impossible.

ANSWER: In this case, too, there is an underlying "reason" missing. You have to accept that this distortion spoils things for you, rather than brings you advantages. The more you observe and understand this, the easier you will find that you maintain it because the child in you believes it will provide you with more happiness. Only calm observation of what is true, what is more advantageous, and what is not, will finally enable you to relinquish, to change. This change, too, will come as if by itself. Observation of this process, understanding of why the psyche retains it, will produce results -- and not battling it forcefully.

QUESTION: As well as the psychological approach, is it not true that prayer and turning to God, asking for help, is of great assistance to us?

ANSWER: The psychological approach is actually prayer in action. If you really analyze what happens here, you will find that in all distortions you thus find, acknowledge, and understand -- without self-moralizing -- you do the best to purify yourself. As discussed in a few recent lectures, the so-called psychological approach is not in contradiction to the spiritual one. Of course, prayer is of help and is to be recommended. But I have to give you more than advocate prayer. And you have to do more than merely pray for help. You have to observe your attitude in prayer. This is a very deep and subtle thing. If you pray and find the hidden attitude that you expect God to do it for you, then your approach is not only unconstructive, but it also indicates a more deep-rooted, wrong attitude about life and your role in it. If you pray for help, but with the full intent and realization that you have to do it; you have to face and eventually change due to full understanding; you have to want to see the truth; that it depends on your efforts and willingness, then prayer is very useful. There is a fine distinction between this healthy and right attitude and the idea that you sit and wait for God to hand it to you. The latter kind of prayer will do no good whatsoever.

QUESTION: But the spiritual approach which you have taught and which has added so much to the psychoanalytical approach -- I was just wondering?

ANSWER: I fully discussed in a few recent lectures why it is healthy and good for you, in this particular phase of your development, to put less stress on the so-called spiritual and more on the so-called psychological. For us, it is all one and the same. They are merely different facets, aspects, and approaches to the same end. Emphasis on the spiritual, too long maintained and at the expense of such self-finding, leads to escapism and the false religion I discussed recently. It leads to the wrong concept of God. If you reread this lecture, you will understand what I mean. The idea that you neglect God by not discussing Him, and that by focusing attention on the distortions so as to be able to change would lead you away from spirituality, is utterly untrue, of course. Common sense will tell you so. If such vague ideas exist, it could be the fear of finding and changing what wants to remain hidden. It may be the expression of a childish hope that by speaking about God and the spirit world and its laws, you will be able to change without pain and discomfort. This cannot be done, of course. Further intellectual understanding about spiritual factors would not induce an inner change. But what you are all doing now on the path is bound to bring about an inner change that brings you closer to true spirituality than all the words you hear in the world, no matter how true and beautiful. Outer belief is one thing; the inner capacity of living these beliefs is an altogether different question. It takes a great deal more time, effort, and pain to achieve the latter. Unfortunately, this is very much neglected by all religious denominations and societies. They still deal with the mere thinking process, which often contradicts and conflicts with the real inner life, the life of the emotions.

May you all, each one of you, find in tonight's lecture something that will bring a little more light and help in your work, a little further incentive, hope, strength, and inner push, without being tense or anxious, so as to free yourself from your own enslavement, to make yourself whole instead of divided. Go all in peace, my dearest ones, on this glorious road of self-realization and freedom. Be blessed, be in God!
