HARM OF TOO MUCH LOVE GIVING; CONSTRUCTIVE AND DESTRUCTIVE WILL FORCES

Greetings, my dearest friends. God bless each one of you. Blessed is this hour.

Tonight I wish to discuss another facet of love, will, and human relationship. From life and from your own experience when really understood, as well as from all previous lectures, you know that these three aspects are interdependent. Each is of the utmost importance for your life and your fulfillment. Together, all of them form one whole. If one, separately, functions in a healthy and productive way, the other two are bound to function as healthily, almost automatically. Yet at times, it is important to consider each one separately. There can be no fulfillment of any sort without good human relationships. And good human relationships are impossible without love and without all the various aspects that are part of love. Nor can you live productively without will functioning properly. Love and will have many negative aspects and so often are distorted in many different ways. Some of them we have discussed in the past. Let us now again consider these two aspects, but from a new approach.

You have learned that it is much more harmful to force yourself to feel love when you do not experience it. In such a case, the wrong kind of will and love is used and therefore a negative result is produced. Yet you also know that if you do not give love, you cannot receive it. Therefore you consciously or unconsciously try to force it. You use your will in order to produce a feeling that as yet does not exist in you. However, in the course of our work together, you have learned that the proper growing process is to admit to yourself that you are as yet incapable of feeling love. You cannot properly face and acknowledge this existing condition which, for now, is that which truly is. It is your present reality. If you do so without guilt and judgment, you will eventually understand why this is so, and with that, your love capacity is automatically laid free. It grows by itself. Some of my friends have begun to experience this process as a result of their work. They have become aware of their forcing current towards others and themselves. Since you want to receive love, often desperately, you cannot afford to acknowledge that you do not give love. Once you face what is true in you, this very truth begins to change.

All of you, regardless of how successful you are in your work of self-finding, if you but look at yourself, can experience that never, never do you have any genuine, warm, constructive feeling that is forced on you either by others or by yourself. Genuine feelings are always spontaneous and come of themselves. They are an indirect by-product of self-awareness. They are like a secondary reaction not determined by your outer will -- by the will that is accessible to your determination. Hence, the primary step is always self-understanding. Then, secondarily, your love capacity grows. Although this is not new, it needs to be repeated. For this knowledge is not yet an integral part of most of you.

Thus far, regarding love, your emphasis was mostly geared to your ability to love since you do want to be loved. Your main concern was your lack of loving because this is often responsible for the failure of relationships that you would want to work out. It takes considerable insight to find out that what you thought was love was no such thing. Many of you have gotten that far, at least to some degree and level of awareness.

Now let us consider relationships from a very different point of view. What if you have really loved, and yet you were rebuffed, rejected? In this respect, there are, for many of you, so many puzzling questions. You do not understand why rejection, in one form or another, has taken place when you are certain that you had such a genuine and strong love force. If this love force was not entirely free of childish currents, then at least it was mingled with real love. This confuses you since you know that love is the key to life and human relationships. Why then, you may ask yourself, does it not work? Is it that there are always selfish, greedy, immature currents existent in the human soul? But then, no one could ever receive love since no human being is quite perfect. At the same time, you observe that some people, certainly with less genuine love capacity, receive a great deal more. This not only confuses you but also increases your sense of insecurity and self-doubt, of injustice, and of feeling victimized. Therefore let us look into this subject and gain a clearer view.

It is just as harmful and destructive to love too much, and thus unwisely, as it is to love too little -- that is, if we speak of a personal love, demanding love in return. A detached love senses to let go, to have warm human feelings of sympathy and understanding wherein there is no demand. But the type of love -- be it in partnership relations, be it in personal friendships -- that needs and wants to possess, this is the type of love that can be as destructive in giving more than wanted as it is destructive in giving too little. To love too much when it is not wanted is as insensitive, as egocentric, and as greedy as loving too little. You do not understand that as yet. If a person is incapable of receiving, is frightened by it, yet his frustrated wish to love comes out in a stronger force than the other is capable of meeting, such a current makes the other person withdraw in fear. When you are unaware of your own inner processes, you are not sensitive to this phenomenon. You merely feel rejected and are busy with this insult. As you may be insensitive to the need of others to receive your love because you are too frightened to come out of your shell, so you may be insensitive to the need of others not to receive more than they can bear at such time. Thus you do not respect the other's integral right not to receive what you wish to give. For you, it is a question of all or nothing. If this all is not received, you withdraw, and it becomes nothing. But if you realize this inner struggle of the other person, if you grow sufficiently to not give more than what can be received, another kind of relationship could come into being that may be very rewarding. But you miss out on it through your inner ignorance.

It may be perfectly true that the other person's incapacity reflects his emotional immaturity, his inner problems and conflicts. But you are angry at all this. You refuse the other's right to have what you yourself may have in a slightly different version. Thus you fluctuate between an overpowering love force that cannot be received, and then resentment and withdrawal. You are as yet incapable of preserving a feeling of human respect and liking if the strong force of your love, though largely genuine, is not welcomed. In your anger, you use the weapon of turning a positive into a negative feeling. You feel resentment, rejection, pride, and you withdraw either from that particular person or from loving again. You find yourself in this destructive imbalance many times without really being aware of it. With this attitude, you destroy potential relationships that could become very meaningful.

We always discussed your own attitudes, your capacity to give and to receive. If you are the person incapable of loving and receiving, you who are on this path know what to do about it. You look inward until you attain self-awareness and understanding of what is going on in you. But if it is the other person who has this incapacity, then you are puzzled and confused. With this new understanding, you may learn to meet the problem. You will now learn not only to question yourself of your capacity to give and receive but also to question the other's capacity in this regard. By your awareness that it is important to sense this, you will become sensitive to the sign and will not blindly rush ahead simply because you wish it. You will learn to read behind the words, to interpret the signs, to perceive what exists in the other even if he is unaware of it.

These words are addressed particularly to those friends who are not predominantly withdrawn, who are eager to give and relate and yet constantly find themselves hindered in it because, for one reason or another, the object of their choice, in one way or another, is unwilling to receive this powerful demanding force that they emanate. If you were but less defensive, less self-concerned with the frustration of your immediate will or of your rejection, less self-willed, you would develop the nobility of spirit to respect the other's incapacity, even if it is "sick." This then would establish a human relationship, whereas your greedy egocentric giving destroys relationship.

Let the other person be, allow him to react differently from how you wish. In this way, your life will be richer for many reasons, not only because you will have more meaningful relationships, but also because you will be less dependent on your own will. You will be able to let go and still like and respect another even if you know his incapacity. Whether you call it sick or immature does not matter. Your opinion may be right, yet you do not grant the other the right you wish to have for yourself. Observe your innermost attitude and currents in this respect. View it from this point of view, and you will eventually grow into awareness of the significance of your rushing forward. You will no longer view this as an asset for which you are unjustly punished by life, but you will see the intrinsic selfishness and greed in it. As you calmly do so, you will automatically mature in this respect too. You will develop the decency, if I may use the word, to allow the other person his way and to respect him. You will have the generosity and nobility of spirit to stand back and let go and be more finely attuned to the other's needs -- whether he is to receive more than you give or less than you want to give. If this happens without contempt, resentment of the other or of yourself, without self-doubt and self-belittling, then you have indeed grown up. Noncompliance to your will can perhaps be met in a mature way on a superficial level of your being. But does it also happen when it reaches into these deeper layers of your personality? Ask yourself this question, and look very closely at what is revealed to yourself if you wish to accept this revelation. As you grow in this way, you will not give up something rich for which you are yearning. You only seem to be doing so as you give up only your immediate will. You will become richer, and I do not mean only in spirit, in maturity, in self-reliance and in self-respect, but richer in your outer life concerning your human relationships.

But again I must admonish you, if you are as yet incapable of feeling in this mature way, do not force yourself into it. Rather see yourself in this strong demanding force you extend and in your reaction after this force is repelled. See it in action, experience it without judging yourself. This is the only way, as I keep saying again and again.

Happiness and love cannot be a volitional process, my friends. It comes as you observe yourself without judgment as to what is good or bad, right or wrong.

Now, my friends, are you one of those persons who is too fearful to love, too withdrawn? Do you not dare reach out into the world and into relationships and rather hide in your own corner whenever a hand is extended to you, whenever love is offered to you? In your fear, could it be that you fail even to recognize it when it comes so as not to burden yourself with the guilt of rejecting what you also crave for? Or are you one of those who is constantly ready to give generously, but perhaps too generously, because out of your need and perhaps also out of childish greed, you disregard the other? You do not sit back, relax, and calmly look at the other person. Or, my friends, are you perhaps a little of both? Look at yourself from this point of view. And as you do so, little by little, by yourself, by the awareness of yourself in this respect, your sensitivity as to the other person's needs will develop. You will sense that it is not a question of the other not wanting to receive anything from you, but perhaps not wanting at this time, in this way. Perhaps it will be easier for him to come out of his shell when he does not meet a love power that is so demanding and so forceful.

It is only too often that both distortions exist in you simultaneously. On the one hand, you yourself may be frightened if you encounter a strong demand. Yet when this demand is absent, you extend it without actually seeing what is offered to you.

Now let us turn to the subject of will. We have discussed it in the past from many different points of view: self-will, the outer and the inner will, various manifestations of healthy and unhealthy will power. In order to recapitulate and give you a little more clarity on the subject, let us now see some of the negative manifestations and the reasons why the will does not function properly.

(1) When you are unaware of what you want, even if what you want is in itself healthy and productive, the very fact that you are unaware of it must produce a negative result. Why? not because of the wish itself but because for some reason you found it necessary to hide it, it causes a negative condition. Such unawareness that once was deliberate really amounts to self-deception. You want something. Yet you feel what you want is wrong, so you try to believe that you do not want it. Outwardly you pretend to yourself and to the world that you do not want what inwardly you want. This then is pretense, self-deception. And it is this that causes the destructive result, not the quality of the wish itself, whether or not the wish is morally acceptable or not. It is the broken awareness with all its connotations that is responsible. Thus you do not want what you want. And such are the disclosures that many of you have found. You are so unsure of yourself and of your own right that you suppress and ultimately repress your wish capacity, your will power. You may transform it so that it reappears in the form of a compromise solution, but this unclarity causes a thick haze in your psyche that is an unhealthy climate and that hinders expression in life for you. If it is an unhealthy wish, you cannot cope with it because you are no longer aware of its existence. But it may very well be that it is a very healthy wish which you do not allow into consciousness because you wish to comply with standards superimposed by your society, by public opinion -- or what you think they are. Thus you may force yourself into something that is by far inferior to your own will coming out of your real self. The reason for doing so is purely negative. It is the lack of courage to be yourself, the exaggerated need to please, or any number of other reasons that you know from past lectures and from your work. Therefore a productive wish proves to be unproductive or even destructive at times, if you are unaware of it.

(2) Another reason why will power or wish capacity becomes unproductive is that you are split in your direction. I do not have to go into this anymore. We have discussed it at length. If your will moves partly into one direction and partly into another, you will experience a very negative result. You will be stymied in your efforts and will experience failure and frustration. Often you may erroneously believe that this is due to moralistic reasons. But it is not so. Both directions may be morally adequate, but the fact that you are not at one with yourself produces what unconsciously you may consider as punishment.

(3) As I have already said in this lecture, if your will is too strong so that it does not consider the obstacles, nor respect other people's inclinations; if it does not take into account the reality of the other person, whether or not this is welcomed and desired by you; if the strength of the wish is stronger than reality warrants, then you defeat your purpose.

(4) A fourth reason is too little will. If you are resigned and withdrawn, become apathetic and are too fearful to want to lead a meaningful life; if you do not dare to do what is necessary to produce such a meaningful life for yourself, but wait for some authority to give it to you, then you cripple your will power and wish capacity.

All four of these aspects prohibit a healthy, relaxed, steady flow of your will and therefore of your wish capacity. Here again is a topic that brings so much confusion because you always tend to regard something as right or wrong, good or bad. So many theories have come into existence -- spiritual, religious, philosophical, or psychological theories. There is the school of thought that says you must not go for results in order to have peace. You must not have any will power. You must let go. And there is the other school of thought that says without will there can be no life, no fulfillment. Do you not realize, my friends, that both of these apparently opposite views are correct. And both can be wrong. So many times, I have shown you such confusions where opposite points of view are both right and can also both be destructive and unproductive. If your will falls under any of those categories I mentioned, if it is strained, if it is governed by immature motives, if you are unaware of it, if it is split, if it is compulsive and too eager, then it is very true to say, let go, relax your self-will. Find out the unifying forces that lie underneath the split of your will so that gradually it may grow together into one stream. But on the other hand, if your will does not function at all, or insufficiently, how can you grow? You do need the will to grow, to live, to love. And yet you do not, on another level. As I have said earlier, you cannot use direct will power to make yourself feel what you do not feel, even though you may want to. But you need your will to observe yourself in candor and without self-deception, whereupon your capacity for loving and living grows automatically.

If you truly want good relationships, you have to want to have them, without strain and without an immediate result. You must not rush for a particular result, bound in time, limited in kind to your own choosing. A relationship includes others, and they too have to be considered, not only you. If such consideration is not given, then you nullify the relationship's existence. Whether such consideration applies to outer and obvious manifestations or whether it concerns hidden, emotional tendencies and attitudes does not make the slightest difference. The latter is only much harder to determine. This then points to the proper combination of wanting and willing, while letting free. This means the self-will is going out, while the good will remains. This good will has to be cultivated anew, over and over. In it, you let go of self-will by giving tolerance to the how and when. In it, you cultivate awareness of your own disturbing currents, as also to the needs and will of the other, while remaining attuned to the fluctuations and changes. For, nothing that is alive remains static. Only a free spirit can be alert and relaxed enough to follow with the stream of eternally changing conditions emanating from others, from yourself, from life's circumstances. In order to do so, your healthy will has to function. You cannot be will-less, but you must be without the rigid confinements of self-will that dictate the details. This then describes the difference between the outer and the inner will. The inner will comes from your real self, which is intrinsically free. If you allow its freedom, it will be without the confinement of self-will.

Without will, there can indeed be no life and no growth. If you wish to fulfill yourself and your potentials, the outer strained will is often a hindrance. But the inner free will has to be cultivated so as to bring about such fulfillment in an indirect way, as is necessary quite often. The direct approach is awareness, and this does not come by itself. It requires your relaxed will. If will is coupled with moralizing judgment, it turns destructive because truth becomes inaccessible. If will wishes to go beyond your own tendency to moralize and is focused on what is true rather than on what is right, will produces truth -- and thereby love.

In any area of your life wherein you have realized your potentials and experienced a measure of fulfillment, you will have had to renew your will constantly. Look back, and you will see that this is so. Yet this will must be free enough to give leeway so as not to be insistent upon the how and the when, upon your particular way in every detail. In anything you wish, the will has to be cultivated again and again, but in a relaxed, generous way, not in framing it with your own limited concepts, not in wishing this success, or that relationship. Such an attitude will enslave you whether or not it is conscious. The inner cultivation of your will, be it for growth, for self-awareness, for realizing a potential, for establishing a meaningful relationship, must be intended and wanted as to the whole. But as to the parts, it must be flexible, must adapt to the ever changing circumstances, conditions, and factors that pertain to it. With this attitude, you will have the generosity of spirit to let the various life forces coming out from your real self and from the other person go to work in a harmonious way.

Now, my friends, study these words -- and when I say study, I do not mean so much the intellectual understanding. As I say again and again, too much intellectual understanding often prohibits inner understanding and therefore growth. Try to perceive these words with your innermost self. Do not try to make yourself live up to all this. See rather where you deviate, that you do so, when and how, without judging or compelling yourself to be different immediately. Just see it. As you proceed in your private work on this path, it will afford you a still deeper understanding from this angle, thus understanding yourself better and so understanding others and life in a more profound way.

Now are there any questions regarding this topic?

QUESTION: Can this compulsive overgiving lead to sadism? And on the other hand, is it the typical root of the missionary?

ANSWER: As to the first question, it would be an oversimplification and also incorrect to say that this would lead to sadism. No. But since everything in the human psyche is interconnected, in some instances one may find a link. But by the same token, it may be connected with masochism.

Both sadism and masochism, which are only two sides of the same coin, as you know, are conditioned and brought forth not by one, but by many facets in the human soul. But to say it comes from or leads to this or any other aspect, would be very misleading.

As to your second question, there is truth in what you say. Whenever a person wants to force something on another, whether this be love or a belief, it stems from self-will. He has to give what he has to offer. I would not say that every missionary necessarily has this trend, but many may. If you have to offer love or salvation, it takes wisdom that comes from accepting that one's own will and ideas are not welcome to the other person. It takes more maturity and wisdom than most people have and, most of all, more self-awareness to let the other free, even in his incompleteness.

As to doctrines, no matter how beautifully sounding a doctrine is, nothing cripples your spirit and your soul more than adopting a superimposed doctrine, even a right one. I have spoken much about this before, yet it cannot be stressed enough that inner growth and freedom can come only by being yourself. Through a path such as this, you will come to inwardly experiencing what some doctrines may teach you in words. That is the only belief that is genuine and that furthers growth.

QUESTION: When you were talking about the will behind love, you mentioned that it is nursed by desire, by a wish. Isn't a will also nursed by experience and judgment? The reason why I ask this is, when talking about love, how about emotional incompatibility?

ANSWER: Of course, will is determined also by experience, not only by your innermost needs, but also by your experiences, also by what you have learned. It is quite an important insight to determine which is which, which one is your real need. Even if this need, as it now exists, is childish and immature, do you know that it is much better for you to own up to this childish need? That does not mean that you necessarily have to put it into action, but means just to own up to it. Be fully aware that it exists. Thus the need transforms into will. A genuine need transposed into will, even if imperfect and immature, is healthier than a mature and healthy will that is superimposed by outer means, determined by educational influence, by others' opinions that you may have adopted for one reason or another, because this then is the self-alienation that we discussed so frequently. Even your own personal experiences of the past may be so misleading. These experiences are conditioned by your patterns, your images, your preconceived notions; and this limited scope of experiences, as well as your slanted outlook on them, will not give you the freedom of reality. It may prohibit your meeting life anew and afresh so as to truly widen your horizon and your ability to experience life as fully as possible. However, if you do live up to yourself, imperfect as this self may still be, this spontaneity and self-awareness of what you really are and want at any given time will free you of the shackles of limitation, of preconception, of a narrow rigid outlook, all of which are the result of looking away from yourself.

To manipulate your will according to what you know or think is right, or even to your own limited past experiences, cripples the spontaneity of the real self. Even if the real you wishes something unproductive and you face this, not necessarily putting it into action, it will be so much healthier than willing something that is not you. If your will is determined by fear, you do not even get to the real wish or the need behind it. If you determine your will by something that is superimposed and that is not experienced by your still childish emotions, you are in for much greater trouble than if you discard the superimposition, because only then can you get through the childishness and get to that area of your being where this very childishness receives the soul forces that make it grow out of itself.

As to the question of incompatibility, I do not quite understand what it is you want to know?

QUESTION: If my childish desire and my love and my will are directed toward a human relationship -- and vice versa, toward and with somebody and mutually -- where there is an incompatibility, then the whole thing is wrong, if such a word expresses what I mean...?

ANSWER: If you really understand what I said in this lecture, this question will be answered. Because if there is such an incompatibility, if such a problem arises, it is just because the will strained -- either from one or perhaps from both -- into a relationship that is not feasible for these particular people. Another type of relationship could exist. But the strong will force pushed reality out of the picture. That which is, is not perceived because it does not want to be perceived. Reality should fit into what you wish it to be. Therefore such problems come into existence.

QUESTION: I would like to ask a question for my little grandson. He is living in fear most of the time. As a result of this fear, he constantly gets sick. Now this fear is that those that he loves, all his loved ones, are hostile towards each other. And if he loves one, the other withdraws. He is constantly torn. I wonder if you could show some way?

ANSWER: There is really nothing I can say that you do not know already. However, I will try to help. In the first place, all of you have to fully face that what he fears is correct. It is not an invention, an imagination on his part. If you fully face this fact, not just acknowledge it superficially, such awareness on the part of all of you will already have a healing effect -- not only on him but upon all concerned. When you fully face this fact, you will encounter the problem of your own guilt. Also this guilt has to become fully aware. Such awareness will bring into clear focus the question, "Have I caused an inner problem in this child due to my own imperfection? How can I live with such knowledge?" In your unconscious knowledge of this pressing question, you shy away from facing it and become more compulsive toward eliminating these destructive feelings that are evidently responsible for the child's fear, and the more compulsively do you get to feel what you do not really feel. And this in turn aggravates the problem in him and in all of you. It increases fear and guilt all around. However, if you face up to that which you feel, and fully understand it, by going to the roots of it, which can only be done without guilt and without judging yourself or others, then you begin to change the atmosphere even long before you are able to feel differently. This must then help him. Oh, you can tell him many things, and he certainly has unusual understanding in this respect. But what you tell him will not really help unless you face what is, without moralizing to anyone, but just accepting your immaturity and, by doing so, learning more about it. Such activity will relieve the strained atmosphere which produces his fear. This strain is caused more by your compulsive striving to be something you cannot yet be because you do not fully understand the roots. Accept this slow process of your growth. Remove the compulsion and the impatience, and the imperfect feelings of hostility will be less harmful than the compulsion to overcome it.

In such a frame of mind, all of you will truly understand that he too brought his unresolved problems into this life as you brought your own. The environment only brings out what exists already. It cannot bring out what is not there to begin with. He has to live out his problems as you are required to live out yours. Your imperfect parents and environmental conditions simply brought the problems to the fore. But this truth will be a personal experience only if and when you remove your hurry, your lack of acceptance of yourself, your dependency on pleasing the moral standards of others so as to be approved, your guilt, and your fear. Until such time, you can help him by quietly pursuing this work of self-awareness and of self-acceptance. You know all this, but so often it is not applied to the everyday little feelings and emotions which you let go by without becoming aware of their existence and therefore eventually of their deeper significance. This will then enable you to perceive the effect that you have one upon the other; and in this, your view -- all of you -- is still limited. That is something you have not yet taken into consideration -- not really.

QUESTION: You mean, me personally? Or you mean all of us?

ANSWER: At least you and your daughter who are in this work of self-finding. Both of you have found in your discoveries about yourself that what he fears is actually so. You have pursued this pattern of division of loyalty. By now, you understand -- and this is a great improvement -- not only that this is so, but, to a degree, why this is so. But you do not as yet understand, or experience, or are sensitive to the effect that this has on others nor that this understanding will also help the child -- understanding without moralizing.

QUESTION: Is there such a thing as numerology, that certain numbers are favorable and others not?

ANSWER: I strongly advise against such things -- very strongly.

QUESTION: Is it nature's plan that a child develops a reaction, a neurosis against a parent or parents, regardless of how good or kind these parents happen to be?

ANSWER: It certainly is not nature's plan -- no. This again shows a complete misconception of man and of life. It is man's doing -- the only way you can grasp and understand why this should be that certain children have the best and most favorable circumstances, and develop so-called neuroses; while in other cases, the conditions may be extremely unfavorable and yet comparatively little neurosis exists. We cannot say none, of course, since no human being is free of it. The only way to understand this is that you are not born once, but come again and again with the problems that are as yet unresolved. It is not nature that gave you these problems.

QUESTION: At one time, you told us it was easier to work on this path here on earth than in the spirit world. Yet we know that our loved ones are developing too. They, too, are working for their self-realization, and are helped by our work on ourselves. Could you explain how this works?

ANSWER: Growth and self-development can, to a degree, take place in every sphere of being. But where the hindrances and obstacles are greatest, there growth can be most effective, provided the person in question so desires. Without hindrances or obstacles, the deeply imbedded problems are not called forth. They cannot manifest, therefore you lack awareness of them. Without such awareness, you cannot grow out of them. All this I explained in the past.

In spiritual spheres where you live without your physical body, you are in a kind of life where you do not encounter the hindrances caused by matter. Without this obstacle, one can still grow and develop to a degree, but certainly not to the same degree. Matter is one constant hindrance. It is one resistance. We talked about psychological resistance. But this is only one aspect, one small fragment of resistance as such. Earth life, life in matter, is one resistance. If you had no resistance whatsoever, you could not live at all. Yet when you resist too much, according to the degree, you cripple yourself, and if the degree passes a certain limit, you cannot live either. Life on earth requires a certain equilibrium between not too much and not too little resistance -- just as with the will. Will is a force that overcomes resistance of matter. The resistance of separation. If it is too strong, it is harmful, and if it is too little, it will not sufficiently overcome the resistance of matter. This is how you can grow much faster because of the resistance. By learning to go with it, you develop inwardly to just the right degree, to the proper balance. Needless to say, it cannot be learned by rules and regulations and laws and doctrines that you absorb with your brain. This is an inner feeling that develops out of such pathwork as you are doing. It is intuitive, not learned. You grow into the right stream of the particular degree of resistance that you need. It is not the same for everyone. Each person has a personal vibration or frequency, the sum total of his entire being, outer and inner. According to this personal vibration, the resistance has to fit, as it were, to the general resistance of matter. To the degree that you live productively and harmoniously, to that degree is your vibration in harmony with the general resistance of matter. That is why development on earth proceeds so much faster.

Be blessed, each one of you. May these words again ring an echo in your innermost being. May they become fruitful for you, perhaps not immediately, perhaps only in months to come, or even in years when, in your work of self-finding, you come to the point when you will really understand what I told you tonight. Be in peace, my dearest ones. Be in God!
