

DEMAGNETIZING NEGATIVE FORCE FIELDS -- PAIN OF GUILT

My dearest friends, greetings and blessings for everyone of you here. The beginning of tonight's lecture will again be a brief recapitulation of certain facets of spiritual laws which I had discussed in the past, particularly in the series of lectures about the images many years ago. We shall now go deeper and lead to further avenues. It is important to understand certain processes of creation within the human psyche, and most of my friends now need what I will say tonight.

The fusion of consciousness and energy is of such a tremendous power that this fusion creates an electro-magnetic energy field, as it were. This field contains every conceivable seed, or possibility, of creation. Every conceivable attitude or concept about life creates such a force field. Once the force field is in action, it sets events, patterns, behavior, reactions, states of body and soul into its specific mold. The magnetism of this field is so strong that ensuing action and events are inexorably set in motion, and these actions and events continue to perpetuate the same power of this specific force field. The force field of a specific attitude to life is also ruled by laws of attraction -- like attracting like. Thus you who have created various force fields as a result of your attitudes, ideas, concepts, and approaches to life attract or repulse events, people, happenings, actions of others and yourself. You set up continuous chains of action and reaction, of which you often lose track. That is, when the event occurs in your life, you no longer know by what specific belief and consequent action you have created it.

This applies of course to both real and false ideas and to consequent productive, blissful or destructive, painful experience. It is an important aspect of this pathwork to at first understand this principle and then to see where and how this applies to your personal life.

My friends on the path have discovered various force fields of distorted ideas which we call "images." You have experienced within you how what you now know to be a misconception about life has governed your actions and reactions and has consequently brought corresponding events to pass. You now see quite clearly that these events are hardly what they at first seemed to be -- coincidence. They occur by immutable law -- the law of self-creation.

You have experienced, in the further course of this path, the depths of the negative emotions in connection with these false ideas. You have also uncovered the negative intentionality that you have instituted as a result. Yet, you find yourself stymied in giving up the whole nucleus of the image or force field. Although you know the ideas are false, you cannot help reacting as if they were true. For example, you believe no woman is trustworthy because you felt your mother rejected you. You now know that this equation is grossly false. Yet you are compelled to react to all women as if they were your unloving mother. You do not want to give up your negative intentionality against her, your feelings of hate, blame, and resentment. You do not wish to open your heart to love any woman. Regardless of your outer, conscious belief, inwardly you now discover that this is how you react. You seem caught or trapped in this image although you know that it is unfair, unreasonable, unintelligent and that it causes you and others pain and frustration, unfulfillment and perpetual guilt and longing.

It is extremely difficult to change these force fields, but it is certainly possible. No one who is not deeply involved in and committed to such a path as this in which deepest self-confrontation on all levels takes place can possibly do this. To begin with, he is not even aware of the beliefs he holds which then create the force fields with all their ensuing chain reactions. To discover the particular images; to experience fully without defense all the feelings involved in them; to take responsibility for the negative intentionality -- all of this is significant progress and deeply meaningful work on the path to purification. But these steps are a necessary prerequisite and do not by themselves change the creative power of the force fields. Something more is needed, as many of you are discovering. I would say that many of my friends on the path have now arrived at such a juncture, at least in part of their personality. You see, know, understand, and experience fully pain, fear, and anger. You assume responsibility for your intents and negative will. But something in you holds you to stay where you are, although you know quite well at what price. This lecture is supposed to help you further from here.

For those who are at the beginning of the path (or those who still defend against fully assuming responsibility for their life and are therefore blocked), the existing image can be infallibly deduced by looking at your life. Your life reveals what your underlying beliefs and attitudes must be. It cannot be otherwise.

The magnetic power of the force field is self-indoctrinating, self-perpetuating. It is like a deeply imprinted motor or mechanism set in motion with great energy. It thus requires a stronger energy to deactivate this motor force and to change a negative force field into a positive one. To put it differently, the image has to be dissolved and the creative energy that was locked up in the image is from now on to be utilized in ways that are compatible with divine law.

Now let us go directly into the main topic of this lecture: how to go about changing a negative force field into a positive one; how to dissolve an image; how to re-create realistic concepts and imprint them so deeply into your soul system that positive feeling, action, and will ensue? This means, how to demagnetize a negative force field?

Different approaches are necessary for the voluntary and the involuntary intentionality. Of course, when the path proceeds, all involuntary attitudes eventually become voluntary, but at certain stages in certain areas you deal with, this is not so. For instance, you may be perfectly aware of having a strong defense, say, against feeling a specific pain. You know by many proofs that this pain must be in you, but you cannot feel it although you want to.

By the same token, a negative intentionality may be quite conscious. Or it may manifest indirectly and you are not yet conscious of it as such. Needless to say, then the approach must be different.

In both instances -- voluntary and involuntary -- it is indispensable that the conscious mind expresses its positive intent, concisely formulated. But this must NOT be done in self-delusion and by superimposing the positive intent over the unconscious irrational resistance and defiance. The two "voices" must be brought face to face, and the determining personality shall have the last word of decision.

We have of course discussed various "reasons" for the insistence to remain in a state of falsehood and pain. Primarily it is a question of identification. As long as you identify only with this negative aspect of your ego-self, giving up something that is the primary motivating force of this ego seems like self-annihilation, so that you cannot give up what seems to be intrinsically you. It is therefore necessary to systematically establish identification with your real self. Unless you do this, volition to give up what destroys happiness and joy must be lacking.

The first steps toward this new identification, apart from simple prayer and meditation, are to reach with your mind into new modalities as I said many times before. If you now hate, say with your conscious mind, "I also contain the possibility to love. I want this new state and wish to utilize all my hidden energies and creative forces." Or if you believe you can function only in a non-feeling, isolated, spiteful state even though you would want your state to be different, declare the inherent possibilities within you: "There are inner powers and energies I wish to mobilize. The same me that is now locked in spite and withholding contains other, more natural and beautiful ways of being. I want to manifest this new state as my own, inherent state."

At the same time, alternately or simultaneously the demagnetization process takes place by going deeply into your innermost stillness. Again, I have talked about this at intervals since the very beginning when this channel was established. I have given exercises for concentration on how to still the mind. Yet many of my friends find themselves apparently incapable of even attempting to do this. I might say that with increasing progress you will develop the self-discipline to give yourself time for this every day. Even only a few minutes pursued regularly will pay dividends, tremendous dividends, my friends.

If you do this seriously -- just becoming still, just expressing your intent to hear the will of God, the presence of God within you -- it will happen. You can also go back to the various lectures I have given about these specific exercises and use them for a few minutes. I need not repeat it here because they have been discussed in the past. Whether you do these specific exercises or use others perhaps more to your liking, the only way to demagnetize a negative force field is to establish contact with your divine reality, your cosmic, eternal self. You must become very still and turn into your inner stillness and wait for its manifestations.

Here you have right away a contradiction that seems apparently insurmountable. As long as a deliberate negativity, a negative intentionality, exists in you, the resistance to commune with your eternal, spiritual self will be too great. And yet, on the other hand, as long as you do not call on the help of your spiritual reality, you must find yourself incapable of giving up the negative intentionality.

Let us take, for example, the common, overall attitude: you wish to punish your parents. You do realize that this spiteful self-destructiveness has absolutely no benefit for you. Yet you feel you cannot even really want to give it up. Since you cannot want to give it up, you do not feel clean enough to let God in you manifest; or to listen to the creative spirit and attune yourself to its presence; or to know who you really are -- who you really are!, the eternal being.

The only way to come out of this self-contradiction that keeps you magnetically held in this position in spite of knowing what you are doing with your life is to begin to use thought processes in a new way. Let us take the same example: "I want to punish my parents by my own misery and spite and non-giving," or "I do not want to love them, so I cannot love anybody else because I want everyone to be better parents than those I really had." Once you are aware of this attitude -- and a good part of the pathwork consists of becoming aware of such things -- then you see yourself hooked and trapped there. The new thought process, to begin with, might be: "I do not want to stay in this position. There are powers within me that make it possible for me to change and feel good and secure about the change. I do deserve it. This change is my birthright. I claim this birthright. I can subsist on good feelings. I can sustain them, I can endure them just as I can endure pain or disappointment. I now decide to no longer believe in the fallacy that either pain or good feelings cannot be borne by me. If there are any areas within me where I still battle and defend against either the painful or the love feelings -- the giving and the receiving of love -- the power in me can make me conscious of it and can help me lift myself out of the groove that has been set by the force field of this attitude and bring a new force field into being. I pray for the power, the belief, the faith, and the volition to be totally committed to living my life in a good, in a deeply feeling, in an honest way."

Even if some part of you still resists while you say these words, my friends, if your innermost will pronounces these words strongly and decisively -- not covering up and denying the negative will but meeting it head on -- a new power is created by the force of the thought, the intent. Only too often you wait for the change to take place without your deciding for a new thought process about the issue in question. It is the thought that must change first. In thought lies the intent. This intent can then seep deeper and deeper into the still resisting layers of your consciousness. In that way the process takes place from two ends: the outermost and the innermost. The outermost by the volitional thoughts you issue forth. The innermost by the divine power you mobilize when you meditate for this specific help. In this way you cannot fail to inactivate the power of the old negative force field and create a new force field that will bring you into ever increasing fulfillment, meaningful life, joy, peace, love.

The lack of understanding that exists in human beings about the power of thought and the power of feeling, how these two together create magnetic fields which in turn create life experience is very regrettable. The next decades will bring a change in this. You always have to begin where it is accessible, and that is your conscious mind, your conscious thinking, willing, and doing. If this were not so, it would be impossible to ever solve any problem. And it has been proven -- on this path, as well as elsewhere -- that often the most severely disturbed individuals completely reverse their lives into happy, healthy, unified, fulfilled beings, while individuals with much less disturbance stay put. The reason for this is that the former are more motivated to act on behalf of this change and therefore succeed.

If you would have to rely on mysterious processes you cannot activate, you would indeed be left to a haphazard chance. But this is not so. The immediate thought process is always available, and the habit of thinking can be changed quite easily, to begin with. The new thought brings inevitably a new feeling, and the new feeling a new attitude. But you always have to begin where it is accessible and you have to leap with the thought over the barrier of the "I cannot" into "It is possible. These potentialities exist in me and I claim them. I want to make them available."

More and more of my friends have recently begun to establish contact with their divinity. You have begun to experience who you really are. But still the hesitancy to avail yourself of this new power keeps you many, many times unnecessarily away from the beauty of your inner reality. To reach it requires more and more investment, but could there be anything more wonderful! Could there be anything more worthwhile! This is the very aim of this path, where you will no longer be needy, my friends, because you will know that everything exists within you that can fulfill every one of your needs. And instead of looking for where the needs can never be fulfilled, outwardly from your parents, from parent substitutes, you will look inwardly where you can never be disappointed.

For that you must come with a clean heart. It is necessary that you give up the dishonesty, the hiding, the projecting, the game playing that exist on subtle levels and which you manage to deny, often even now, after you have temporarily admitted them into your consciousness. It is certainly not only possible to do this, but it is eventually everyone's fate. To be free from these dishonesties is the natural, universal law. It is that which is really the easiest. This is your fate, inexorably. To hold on to what is most difficult and contorting for your soul, and hurtful, is senseless because one day you must come to be your whole, real, joyous self where you know who you are -- not this little ego, but the Ultimate Creator of whom you are a manifestation.

If you listen into your deepest stillness, calling upon the creator in you, the stillness in you will answer. This is inevitable if you really want to know it, if you really want to know this peace. If you do not want to know this peace, this joy, all solutions to your life, all fulfillment conceivable, then it is a clue for you: you wish to hold on to something dishonest that you are loath to give up. Look at it, look at it squarely. When you see it, then you can confront yourself why you want to hold on to it. Then you can make that leap in your thought process.

Here I come to the second part of this topic. One of the important obstacles to wanting to establish the channel with your real being, to wanting to give up dishonesty is the guilt for pain you have inflicted or are still inflicting. I touched upon this subject before, but the time has come where we have to go into it more carefully.

A lot has been done in these last years where you have learned to open up to pain inflicted upon you; pain you have endured; pain that others have inflicted on you -- first by your parents when you were a child, and later by others. You learned to no longer defend quite so much against such pain, and more and more you can fully feel and experience it and thus free yourself.

However, the entire psychological movement has turned away from the other aspect -- feeling the pain of guilt for pain given by you to others. This is so for partially good reasons. Every truth can be distorted. In the days of pre-psychology, religion had indoctrinated man with a distorted, debilitating guilt feeling. False guilts, fear of a punishing god, guilt that did not make it possible for man to raise his head in dignity and in the knowledge of whom he ultimately is -- in order to straighten out such distortions, the pendulum must always temporarily swing into an opposite extreme until the right balance, the truth, is being found.

I make a clear distinction between remorse and guilt. Remorse deeply feels the pain of wrong-doing but never loses sight of your divinity. You become a better, stronger person when the pain of remorse is being fully savored. Guilt crushes the self and denies its intrinsic divinity. The current trend, as a result of the pendulum having swung from the opposite extreme, makes all guilt appear as neurotic. In the past I also spoke about the difference between false guilt and real guilt and how one can hide the other.

If you cannot bear pain that others inflict upon you, then neither can you experience the pain of your guilt in a constructive way. The guilt of your own distortion must be fully seen, faced, felt, understood as to all its ramifications and chain reactions. Otherwise you can never be in the clear with yourself. Unless you do so, you cannot be whole. You cannot look at yourself with love and respect. You cannot be who you really are.

You have to do this in a very realistic and well-proportioned way, without any exaggeration, without any hiding, without dramatization. It is possible to recognize and connect with the chains you are producing with your negative attitudes and the hurts you inflict with them directly or indirectly. The hurts of omission are no less hurtful than those of commission. Have you not been deeply hurt by what was missing in your life as a child, by your parents' inability to give more warmth, good feelings, closeness? Well, you perpetuate the same onto others by your vindictive imitation of the attitude that hurt you most.

If you are crushed by the pain of your guilt, this, too, is only so because you have decided for this reaction, my friends. You can, whenever you so wish, question the necessity of being crushed and listen to your inner stillness for a new possibility of reaction. Yes, you will feel the pain, and so you should. But as with the pain others have given you, by fully accepting it, it ceases to be pain (and many of you have experienced this). So will it be here. When you fully feel the pain and are thus being motivated with your whole heart to want to give up the negative pattern, the pain will make way to wonderful new energy, light, hope, love, beauty.

The violation of spiritual law can only be corrected when you learn to feel hurts you inflict and have inflicted, without being annihilated; without feeling no good; without feeling worthless; without crumbling. Feel the pain of your withholding; of your spite; of your maligning (in your mind, or perhaps even in actuality). By any kind of negative intentionality, you cannot help depriving and hurting others just as these attitudes must hurt yourself. For there is no conceivable difference between yourself and others. Whatever you do to others, you do to yourself, and vice versa. I have said this many times before, but in your mind you still make a distinction. So much so, that you go on being spiteful and hating.

Now, my friends, let yourself feel the pain of inflicting pain: without crumbling, without exaggerating, without doubting your divine heritage. If you can do this, you have found the all-important key that will make you want to open up to your divinity with all its joy and its eternal reality of love. If you cannot bear the pain of your guilt and look away from it, then you cannot feel deserving, and you must block the contact with God in you. So this is one of the most important keys you need.

The facing of the guilt of the pain you inflict is really not very different from the pain you have received. In both instances you can exaggerate it and make yourself incapacitated for life. Or you can decide not to feel it at all. Or you can allow the feeling, let the feeling be, and say: "Yes, they have made mistakes. I have made mistakes. They were blind and groping, and so was I. They were in darkness, I was in darkness. This is regrettable, but this is what we are all here for. And I now lift my head in the dignity of who I am. I know the greater power within me will help me to feel pain I have given and pain I have received." This attitude can now be cultivated and pursued, my friends. You do have the courage. You do have the greatness. You do have the possibility in your inner system to feel this and become stronger and better, not weaker and worse as you fear.

It is absolutely necessary that you be totally aware of and make all the connecting links of cause and effect, of received pain and given pain and how one leads to the other and back in an endless chain reaction. It is in your power any time you wish to break this chain. When you decide to go into this area of your being; to look at it; to express your intent to avail yourself of all divine help in you, call upon this help. Become so still that you can listen or feel it, know its presence.

The apparent paradox lies, as so often in so many other areas, in that the more you hide from the pain of your guilt, the more ruthlessly you punish yourself. Conversely, it is true that the more you face and feel that pain, the less will you need to punish yourself. The negative attitude of hiding from yourself what you are doing, what you really feel, creates a negative force field that perpetuates itself in the following way: by punishing yourself for your unfaced guilt, you must stay in the very attitude that accumulates the guilt more and more. You are truly caught in one of the most tragic of vicious circles. Because you imagine that you cannot face the pain of your guilt, you cut yourself off from your heart, your center of being, and from your innermost life. You feel forever undeserving of joy. If you are undeserving of joy, your needs must remain eternally unfulfilled. If you feel undeserving and unfulfilled, you go on punishing the world for this painful frustration. You cannot dare turn to the wondrous magnificence of your inner presence to help you out of this trap because doing so would instantly fill you with light and joy. You feel that because you have given pain, you do not deserve such an experience. But how can you break the negative pattern unless you avail yourself of the power of God within you? And you cannot experience God within you without also experiencing joy, peace, and light. How are you ever going to break the vicious circle unless you use this key?

Go into your inner stillness right now. Declare that you wish to feel the pain that is held in you, as it was given and as it was received. Declare that you wish to be the beautiful person you really are. Feel both the pain of your guilt and the beauty of your real self. Thus you alter the course you have set in motion. Thus you create a new force field because you demagnetize the old one. This is the way now, my friends. As you do this, as you feel the pain of the guilt and the pain of what has been done to you, it will become one and the same pain. You will then forgive yourself, as you forgive others, as it was said in one of the greatest prayers. Then you will be free, free to let go and let God in you! Let God manifest through you more and more in your everyday life and be infused with its inspiration and wisdom, with its joy and peace.

These are not mere words, my friends. They are unshakable reality that can be verified by anyone who wishes to go on this path all the way. These are not promises, these are not abstract philosophies or principles. These are concrete actions to be put into everyday living. You will then no longer depend on others, but will be your real self, your divine self. You will therefore have true relationships, not dependent relationships. This is your ultimate fate. It is up to you how soon you make it come true.
