

INNATE HUMAN CAPACITY TO CREATE

Greetings and blessings for everyone of you here. Welcome to the many new friends searching for their own inner path. And welcome to my old friends who are already on the path. I will try in this lecture to combine the topic in such a way that it serves a purpose for both groups of people. Both for those who are new here and do not know the material, who are searching for some answer to come to them tonight perhaps as an initial part of a larger answer to come gradually and, of course, also for you who are already deeply involved in your self-exploration and need a further clue on your way.

I will speak tonight about man's innate capacity to create. This potentiality is astoundingly underestimated. It is infinitely greater than you could possibly realize now. Your scientists do not know of this potentiality, nor do your psychologists or philosophers. With the exception of a very few enlightened ones, most people do not know of their dormant capacity to create and to recreate their lives. Some may believe in it in theory, but few, indeed, experientially know. I spoke of this many times in the past, so some of this will be slightly repetitious. But I will also go deeper and further into this topic in a more focused way.

When man adopts his body and ego state in this three-dimensional world, he automatically closes off memory he has of another state, or other states, of consciousness in which he is much less confined, in which he is much freer, much more aware, and infinitely more capable of molding his life to a degree that the human consciousness could not possibly even comprehend. For the power of thoughts, feelings, and attitudes is enormous. This power exists just as much now in your present state; only you do not make the connections. You do not know that what you experience in this moment you have molded in such a precise way that there can be no mistake about it. As I have often said, the sum total of all your conscious, semi-conscious, unconscious, explicit and implicit thoughts, beliefs, assumptions, intentions, feelings, emotions, and will directions -- conflicting as they may be -- creates a definitive result. This result is your present experience and the way your life is unfolding for you. Your present life expresses exactly, like a faultless mathematical equation, what your inner state is. It can thus very well be used as a map into your inner regions. This is, after all, part of the method of the pathwork.

I have also often stated, and many of you have verified this, that the hidden, feared, guilt-producing, and denied thoughts and feelings are more powerful in their negative creation than anything you deal with on the conscious level. For fear and guilt are potent creative agents. They contain a great deal of energy. On the positive level, enthusiasm, joy, vitality, interestedness, stimulation are such potent energy agents.

A path such as this must therefore be intensely concerned with exploring what it is you do believe, feel, will, assume, and intend on layers of your personality that are not immediately accessible. They do create often what you do not wish to experience at all simply because you do not know what you bargain for and what "side-effects," if I may use this expression, are attached to your unwise wishes, false assumptions, and negative intents. Also, you ignore the potency of this psychic material and how infallibly it translates itself into the creation of matter, of events and circumstances, and of life experiences.

When man adopts this limited ego state, he does so for very specific purposes. He comes into and manifests and expresses himself in this limited state for the purpose of purification and unification. It would not be possible to do this as quickly and as effectively if you were, my friends, in full possession of your consciousness and your faculties. For your ego personality, as it expresses itself now, is but an isolated aspect, or several isolated aspects, of your total personality. A much "larger," fuller, more whole, and more purified part of your total or real self does not manifest overtly. I often mentioned that personality consists of aspects of consciousness. The manifestation of certain aspects in an isolated form (three-dimensional reality and ego) affords possibilities of focus and awareness that are lacking when these unpurified aspects are submerged in the largely purified personality. They can easily be overlooked, but they nevertheless exist as essential hindrances to further developments that by far surpass the scope of human consciousness. Such developments proceed of course in spheres of reality that cannot be comprehended by you now.

It is, however, possible to activate the capacities of the larger self, to focus in its direction and be receptive to its ever-present inner voice. Similarly it is possible to focus on and be receptive to negative aspects of your personality that lie deeply buried and that also need to be tackled on your evolutionary road. The path teaches you to contact all these hidden layers and deal with them appropriately. So there are parts more developed and parts less developed which are you and which are not manifest. That which is manifest is therefore in the position and has the equipment to explore, to bring out and to unify itself with the other parts that are not actualized at this time.

When individuals undertake this exploration as their main task in life, all restlessness disappears and a deep sense of meaning and fulfillment comes into the soul. With that, slowly but surely life's frustrations begin to disappear and rich fulfillment begins to take their place. For man can only find his place in life when he focuses his attention on the reason for coming into this plane in the first place. Conversely, there are the many who arbitrarily make a split between what they call "living" and their spiritual development. They do not want to give too much to the latter because they foolishly fear that this shortchanges the former. The more they concentrate on outer material living without bringing it into a cohesive, meaningful connection with wider and deeper considerations, the more restless and depressed they become.

Whatever divine laws and attributes exist in the universe, the moment they express themselves in the isolated ego state, disconnected from deeper, inner reality, they become distorted and destructive. Let me give you an example.

When the infant is being born, it feels its own omnipotence. This is known to psychology. Psychology and psychiatry designate this very obvious expression of the infant's claim to omnipotence as immature unrealism and destructive egocentricity. And it is that, of course. But it is also much more, my friends. It is a memory of another state, a state of consciousness in which indeed thoughts become things and events the moment they are being formed. Since time and distance are part of the three-dimensional illusory state of consciousness, they no longer exist in a realm of much more expanded consciousness. The consciousness of the infant is partially still tuned in on the state of his total personality, but in "translating" this memory into the confined, limited ego state, it comes out in a "jumbled" way. Since the ego state is a concentration of the less purified state (always, of course, in combination with already developed and purified aspects which are supposed to come to the aid of the personality in the task of this life), the power to create takes on a distorted, undesirable form. The ego always lives in the illusion that it is not only separate from others but that others are essentially antagonistic to its well-being. So everything the ego does is always either against, or in competition, or in comparison with others. This is what creates the destructiveness and egocentricity. It makes power a dangerous weapon, as you all well know. You all experience power as something you fear in others and feel guilty about in yourself. Power is thus always exclusive of love and joy for it is an intensely separating expression.

But when you conciliate your ego split with the real, total self and thus discover the unitive principle, you not only discover that your interest is never in opposition to the interests of others (although on a superficial surface level it may first appear that way), but you also discover that power and love need not be opposites. You can then begin to use your innate power to create and recreate your life and yourself. You may now understand better why the knowledge of your power to create is dangerous as long as you have not purified that distorted aspect that has found expression in this body and in this life, and as long as this aspect has not discovered the eternal inner realities which are much more real than what you consider outer reality.

The infant's frustration when his thought and wish do not instantly become fact is obvious. Infantile temper tantrums often occur precisely due to this reason. The immediacy of cause and effect -- cause being the thought or wish, effect being the experience -- is a constant "given" in the state of consciousness that goes beyond the ego. One of the tasks most isolated ego aspects (human incarnations) have to learn is trustful patience, flowing with the stream, unwillful receptivity. Hence memory of the power to create must be temporarily cut off so that this manifest aspect of personality can learn what it has to learn. Through the very learning of this lesson, the deeper connections establish themselves again spontaneously. Only it does not seem to be rediscovered memory. It seems like a new discovery: the connecting of thoughts, wishes, intents, feelings, and attitudes with experience establish the organic awareness of the power to create. Now there is no longer the danger to use power against others. Now the illusion that self-interest must be against the interest of others is pierced.

I hardly need to mention here that not only actual infants make the egocentric, antagonistic kind of claims to omnipotence. Undeveloped, immature, and destructive people do too, and they often act them out.

I often hinted at the fact that evil does not exist as a reality in itself. Evil is always a distortion of divine truth. Every destructive, negative attitude can easily be explored as to its root manifestation. It can then be seen that only in its ego manifestation, in its separateness is it destructive or evil but that the very same basic trait has an entirely different effect and meaning if it manifests in the depths of unified consciousness -- in the larger, wider reality of the inner planes. This is exactly the reason why the isolated, incarnated aspect of the total personality manifesting in a body and an ego must temporarily forget its total capacity, ability, and its complete experience in a state that can only be wholesome when the whole self is involved.

Wherever there are misconceptions, ignorance, false ideas, and withholding emotional matter (spite, stubbornness, rigidity, inertia), there exists stagnant energy that must create further disturbance. It must create negative experience. As I said, it is very potent energy. Only when you release it directly and honestly can you transform this energy.

You, my friends, who follow this path have often experienced the tremendous energy that permeates you when you release the stagnant matter of pent-up negative feelings. When you physically, emotionally, and conceptually express rage, hate, and fury, you not only make new connections about yourself that give you a new understanding about your role in life and why you are where you are. This very released energy is also highly potent creative stuff. I mentioned several times this year that the time has come for you when you can convert negative energy and consciousness into positive manifestation. Well, this is what you can do now. To some extent you have actually begun to do so, but you are not yet sufficiently aware of the power of this energy you have just released. If you can at that moment after it has left your system and begins to flow reconvert it into a positive channel, you can indeed bring new creation into your life.

The foregoing will make you understand how much power to create exists in you. But even hearing these words will not convey the truth to you in a real way unless you have overcome certain separative attitudes which would make this knowledge dangerous for you and for others. But those who are totally committed to their innermost being, to the path into their own inner regions with all its apparent hardships of self-revelation, of self-confrontation; by virtue of this act and attitude become increasingly more aware of spiritual reality, of their own state of eternal being that cannot die. And they also become aware of the power of their thoughts, the power of their intent, the power of their feelings. They learn to be careful what thoughts they think, but they neither repress nor suppress undesirable, destructive thoughts. They know that this does not help. They are learning to deal with such thought material. They challenge the accurateness. They are open for other alternatives. They learn to understand what is in them that makes them want to think that way and what is the price they really pay. They begin to see the creation because the relationship between the still separate cause and its effect begins to become more apparent.

As this growing process proceeds, recreation takes place. It is not a reward for good behavior. It is a simple act instituted by the self that is now in a much increased state of awareness and now knows what it is doing and why.

Many of my friends on the path have begun to experience this process as an ever-increasing living reality that can be absolutely trusted. It is unfailing in its lawful process. But recreating or creating can never be a willful act. It must never be used while bypassing anything within your psyche. There are metaphysical and spiritual orientations which know of and postulate this creative thought power. But they often overlook the danger of bypassing and of skipping steps within the psyche. They become hypnotized, as it were, by a truth they have discovered -- the truth of self-creation. And they can create and recreate wherever the psyche is relatively free from obstruction. But where this is not the case, self-creation is blocked and stagnant energy becomes even more potent. A conflict is being created that tears the soul apart. The soul does not develop harmoniously in that way in that the personality builds on that which is already free and neglects that which needs all the focusing. In that state the use of power (even if it is not overtly expressed against anyone) becomes so dangerous that it may sooner or later lead to a personal crisis. Such crises would be avoided if the personality would focus on the undeveloped part.

This is the reason why this specific path requires a lot more courage and honesty than most other orientations in practice today. But it is a safe and truly unifying path that leaves nothing limping behind. It makes for real harmony of the soul just because the process is slow and there are no quick, magic results. The focus must be, for a long time, on those dark areas. And that is for your own protection, my friends. Nothing could make you as safe as that, because you avoid a splitting off process, a splitting off that then defeats the task for which you have come into this life. You have come to fulfill your task and concentrate on, as well as dealing with, those very aspects you feel least inclined to deal with. That is the very reason you squeezed yourself into this narrow, uncomfortable, confining, and often painful state in which you temporarily dwell. Only aspects of you are here, to be sure, but that which identifies with these narrow aspects must suffer when the total reason for being in this human ego state is not yet conscious. The reason why you in particular came and what it is you have to fulfill and deal with must become known. What is the weakness you have to bring out? What is the ugliness you do not want to see? These are the obstructions that cannot make you create freely. You could create already now, consciously, wisely, beautifully, and satisfyingly -- not, of course, to the same degree as when you are free from the ego-body state but nevertheless infinitely more than you do now. That is, you do constantly create whether you know it or not. But the trouble is precisely that you do not know what creations you produce unwittingly. You create with every breath you take, with every thought you think, with every attitude you display. These are powerful agents, my friends, and you had better know what you are doing and how you create. Your disconnection from the creative seeds you plant and their results is what causes so much unnecessary pain and frustration. You see the result often only much later without the slightest awareness of what in you has produced it. But this awareness can be recaptured if you so desire.

Focusing constructively (and that is very different from doing it in a maudlin way) on the undeveloped aspects in you means you fulfill the task for which you came into this particular world; it means that you unify yourself so that you can actualize the potent, creative power and use it consciously and deliberately in your life now.

The creative process and the specific techniques to learn are given to you slowly. I have shown you some of the techniques in connection with meditation. When you meditate, you create. In this concentrated, relaxed state, energy and consciousness focus in such a way that powerful creative seeds are being released. But meditative and creating techniques must, perforce, be a secondary preoccupation for the reasons just mentioned. However, when a certain foundation of inner self-purification and self-awareness exists, these techniques can be expanded. It will then be safe from the point of view of this spiritual path. Your being will truly be grounded then in reality and in a unifying process so that no aspect you came to fulfill will remain unattended to.

The organic process of learning creative meditation, recreating life experience, will come as an intuitive, spontaneous expansion of your consciousness. Just as you will intuitively understand cosmic reality in an experiential (as opposed to a theoretical, intellectual) way, so will you learn to avail yourself of your innate powers and resources.

There is an inner mechanism that is extremely important for you to understand and that I would like to elucidate for a minute. My friends working on this path must have experienced quite frequently that your helper may suggest a specific meditation and commitment in meditation to a positive self-expression you deeply desire, long for, and commiserate about because you miss it. You then, as you go about doing so, experience inexplicably a resistance to follow through. Something in you seems to stop you so that you cannot bring yourself to really do it. Or you may forget to do it on your own; it simply does not occur to you. Or your thoughts have no energy, conviction, and clarity; they are diffuse and you feel that they thus have little effect. At times, you may even consciously experience an outright resistance to meditate for the very thing you most desire. What is this block?

Let us suppose you are lonely. Let us suppose you long for a full and fruitful partnership experience: an abundance of joy, of exchange, of sharing, of mutuality on every level. You really have a birthright to experience this and other fulfillments. For the universe's abundance is there for everyone. No one is excluded. Nevertheless, it may hardly even occur to you to actively sow the seed in meditation (which means creating it) by a clear, definitive thought in that direction, by a commitment to wanting it, to experiencing it, to realizing and bringing into actuality this experience. You may be perfectly aware of the principle of such meditative practice. Nevertheless you desist from employing it. What is even more significant is that when, upon suggestion, you do formulate the creative thought pattern, you find a strange and inexplicable reluctance in you. It is as though there were a wall in you that prevented you from the clear, concise commitment to what you most ardently yearn for. Have you ever thought about the meaning of this resistance? You want something desperately. You intrinsically believe it could exist for you. You accept the principles of creation with your own mind. Nevertheless, you find yourself strangely paralyzed in your mind to truly let go of your thoughts, to send your thoughts into the fertile soil, into the creative substance or what I call the soul substance where any seed will grow to fruition.

The reason for this reluctance is really very simple. It is the same self-protective, finely calibrated mechanism that knows there is something in you not yet ready for this experience. You yourself have put obstructions in the way. Perhaps there is an unwillingness to give and accept reality on your level. Perhaps there is a concealed negative attitude toward the other sex you do not wish to deal with because you simultaneously wish and need too much and are not prepared to solve this conflict in you. Whatever the obstruction is, it should be confronted, explored, understood, and dissolved. If it is not and you nevertheless create because you have a strongly focused mind and will, the superimposed outer will must also have its effects. It is a "will power construction" that conflicts with the inner denial and obstruction. The denial to meditate and create is in such an instance quite meaningful and should be heeded. For it will reveal the nature of the obstruction that can then be eliminated. Otherwise you create willfully on an ego level which cannot satisfy the heart and soul.

The ego mind has the power to create. It does so continually. But if it creates separately from the inner being, the results must be accordingly. Will power, the outer will, can indeed be effective up to a certain degree. It creates matter, sub-matter, and experience but not to your blessing. It creates with a willfulness that lacks wisdom, full view and understanding, vision and depth. It lacks the inner connectedness and wholeness so that what it constructs is often more painful than desirable. Practically this would manifest, in the example we have chosen, in creating a partnership in which primarily those areas in the self that have been neglected would color and affect the relationship, poisoning it as if from underground.

Now, when you find your inner voice resisting the creative thought process, this should be a sign for you that there are steps to take inside of you. What are these steps, you must ask. You must shift the focus of creation to exploring the meaning of your reluctance to create what you long for, and find out what stands in the way. You must then create, instead of the desired experience, the awareness and comprehension of your obstruction to it. This will then eventually dissolve the reluctance so that you find yourself wholly free to plant new creative thought material into the soil of your soul substance.

You cannot create anything that does not already exist in the universe, my friends. Everything exists already -- it exists within you. All the answers, all the knowledge, all the power to create, to feel, to enjoy, to experience -- all worlds exist within. For the true universe is inside while the exterior world is but a reflection like a mirror image. Everything you ever need to know about yourself and your life exists within, and this knowledge can be actualized if you learn to focus, to want it, to aim for it, to commit to it, to create it. Some of the answers exist on more superficial levels in the so-called subconscious. Some are on much deeper levels, but it is all accessible if you undertake the steps.

So, creation and recreation are primarily a focusing. If you want to create from your inner being, it must be a relaxed focusing. If you create from the ego level, it will be a tense, anxiety-producing focusing. If it is an inner, relaxed focusing, it will be relaxed precisely because you do not skip any steps. You finely listen into the responses of your inner self, and if you detect obstructions, you will heed them and then deal with them. Thus you create the condition in you to comprehend your obstructions.

This is one aspect of the creating and recreating process. It is a very important aspect that can be used not only by those who are already on the path but even by those who perhaps enter such a path. All of you can listen into yourself and ask your innermost being where to go, in which direction to focus. But to learn how to listen is an art in itself and often comes only later on the path. It requires already some degree of self-knowledge. This is not easy to summon up for the novice, but it is possible, at least temporarily, to lay aside self-will and open up to whatever the inner voice sends forth. It requires, for example, awareness of your wishful thinking; of your stake in wanting a certain answer and not another; of your fear of getting a certain answer. All these attitudes and feelings may be subtle and well concealed or rationalized so that some degree of self-discernment is necessary until the voice can truly be free. You will trust the voice only to the degree you have thus freed yourself. Each time you consciously and deliberately lay aside your self-will; state how it manifests, what you would want to hear and what not; and then nevertheless express your trust in the divine voice; you will become stronger and freer. Thus your faith will stand on a firm, realistic foundation.

To the degree you are aware of wanting one answer and not another, you will avoid confusion and diffusion. Otherwise you delude yourself into believing you receive divinely inspired answers which are nothing more than your ego's wishful thinking. Only when you have attained a state in which you can be very clearly aware of the personal stake of the ego and of wanting a certain thing in one way and not in another way, can your own inner answers begin to be reliable.

But if you are already aware of your stake and inclination to distort and to be partial rather than impartial to the answer you wish to get, in that awareness itself you create a new channel of truth into your inner reality. You may then perceive a deep, deep inner voice that speaks truth. Then the focusing will be meaningful, relaxed, and yet concise enough to create new thought-forms and therefore new, desirable experiences.

A second important aspect about recreation is the time element that you have to deal with on the ego level. Impatience is another distortion from a fuller state of consciousness in which creation is immediate. The thought produces the form the moment it is uttered. Impatience is the memory of this experience without the connectedness with the inner being so that the lesson the ego has to learn is not comprehended. Only on the ego level is everything separate: effect from cause; soul from soul; form and experience from thought; inner from outer; etc. Life itself appears to you a static, "objective," fixed thing into which you are put. It seems totally separated and disconnected from your own inner processes. These are the same illusions as your concept and experience of time, distance, movement. They are all by-products of the limited, separated ego state. Your life is, in reality, a merely subjective expression of you, not a fixed, objective, immovable "reality." Everything you experience seems to exist only in those seemingly objective terms of the ego. The more you focus into that direction, the more it will seem that way to you. But once you learn to be more focused into the inner reality, you will also perceive much more this other, fuller reality in which the separated aspects move together into a wonderful and meaningful web of interaction and wholeness.

Part of the creating process is the patience to let be so that you learn the trust to allow life to express back to you what you put into it. And that requires the waiting period for the seed to grow. How do you wait? Do you wait in doubt? Do you wait with impatience? Do you wait in fear? Do you wait in tension? Or do you wait in quiet trust? Or is your trust perhaps a gullibility and an expression of wishful thinking so that you cannot possibly trust your trust? Do you want whatever it is so badly that a forcing current is being created which in itself prohibits fulfillment because its tension and its emotional and mind-content defeats creation? If the waiting is truly relaxed, you will have no doubt about the fulfillment. You will know that the seed grows into a wonderful plant.

That recreating process unfolds forever more when the ego personality unites with the other aspects of self that had previously not manifested on the surface. The more this happens, the more joyfully you will create. It may sound confusing when I say you have to learn not to cringe away from pain and then say that it is your birthright to be in a state of joy. It may sound like a contradiction when I say you have to be willing to give up (at least for the moment and in the right spirit) what you wish to create and what you must have faith in your being able to create. But these are contradictions only on the most superficial ego level where duality (either/or) reigns supreme. In reality these are mutually interdependent principles that must unite in harmony. As you cramp yourself into any desire that is too strong, you close the doors to joy and relaxed creation -- inner creation. The cramp always indicates somewhere a negation, a doubt, a negativity that must be unearthed and specifically dealt with.

In the delusion of the ego, you perceive life as your enemy, foreign, and antagonistic to you while you are its victim. In that delusion you cannot create. So you will see, my friends, that your realization on this path of how you create your suffering will inevitably free you to create your happiness.

Let me close by saying to you that you are a great deal more than you can possibly believe now. If you walk in the direction of finding this real self, of identifying with it through the layers of darkness, you must discover the unending beauty of the universe. With every breath you take, you imbibe its potent love and wisdom. There is nothing that surrounds and permeates you that does not express the magnitude of a divine and benign creation. The more aware you become of it, the more joy and gratefulness must spread in your heart. The unending beauty of the universe can only be experienced as reality (as opposed to theory) when you work your way through your dark areas.

Be blessed, every one of you. Feel the love that is extended to you from a realm in which you have many friends who have guided you here. Be in peace.
