

BALANCE

Greetings, my very dearest friends here. Blessings for everyone of you. Again with great joy do I dip into your world, temporarily, and give you another step, a helpful step if you choose to make it so. I have announced I will speak about balance in this lecture. For balance is what keeps the universe intact. If there were no balance, no balancing consciousness, no balancing law, everything would disintegrate. All the natural laws that you know and those you may call "supernatural" laws because you do not know them and because they exist on another level of reality, are laws of balance. They come from balance and lead to balance. And this balance is not a cold, mechanical, coincidental factor but is the expression of supreme intelligence and purpose.

Every single aspect of the law of balance is most meaningful and has a consciousness of its own. Now, there are the physical laws where, up to a certain degree, it is possible for you to find the law of balance. I say only up to a degree because the connection with levels of reality that you are not aware of must also exist. Otherwise these laws could not exist. In the same way, your bodily manifestation could not exist without the life you have on other levels of reality. This applies to everything else, not just to entities but to universal laws as well.

All the planetary systems are held together by these meaningful laws. If they were not, they would break apart, the planets would clash into one another, and the whole system would disintegrate. It is exactly the same in the microcosm, in the human body. The human body is held together by a supreme law of balance of which you human beings know nothing as yet. If this law would not prevail, all your cells and particles would disintegrate and spread apart, and the physical structure of your entity could not be held together.

The law of gravity, all laws of physics, of chemistry, of biology, of every conceivable science in your physical reality is governed by the principle of the great law of balance. Some of the laws are obvious for your scientists. Others are more intricate and lie unrevealed behind the curtain.

Higher mathematics contain the key to these laws. But again I am speaking of mathematics beyond your level of reality. And only a few enlightened human beings have sensed the relationship between mathematics and the key to the universe, the key to creation.

Balance exists on all levels. On the physical level balance is order and creates order. Imbalance is disorder, but it does not create more disorder (only temporarily and up to a degree) because the temporary disorder is only another step toward an order of a much higher organization. On the emotional level balance means harmony -- the harmony of feelings. It leads to more harmony. Imbalance means of course disharmony, negative feelings. Disharmony must eventually lead, through the very disharmony, to a greater harmony of a higher order. On the mental level, balance means sanity and must lead to more balance and more sanity. Imbalance on the mental level means insanity which can only be temporary, but must eventually lead toward a greater sanity of a higher organization. The greatness of divine law is that disintegration is only a step toward integration. Everything must inexorably lead to integration, order, harmony, light, balance, love, intelligence, and health.

The law of balance is therefore always integrating. Balance means also the right measure. Take any manifestation in the world of matter that you experience through your bodily senses. On this level of consciousness, divine manifestations appear as opposites but, as I so often mention, are not so in reality. Take for example, warmth and cold. In the right measure they are both indispensable for harmonious living. Each has its own purpose, its own function, its own meaning in the greater scheme of things. Both symbolize creative forces and currents indispensable to the life of the spirit. In materialization, they are indispensable to physical growth and sustenance of life. I am not speaking here of fixed "temperatures," for there is no norm applicable to all. What is warm and cold may vary greatly in different cultures and locations where differently organized human beings live. The tropical rain may be as "cold" as that climate requires to balance out a disharmony that may have set in. The mild arctic sunshine may be just the sufficient warmth needed there to establish the balancing factor.

In imbalance, pleasurable warmth turns into unbearable heat, and purifying cold can become frozen iciness. Both can kill temporary life manifestations when in imbalance and in exaggeration. It is the same with every other physical manifestation or, for that matter, emotional or mental manifestations. Let us remain for the moment on the physical level. Take light and darkness. The balance between these two phenomena creates a beautiful harmony and provides mankind with exactly what it needs in this respect. But in the dualistic misconception, they appear as opposites. Although they are a manifestation of the dualistic state of consciousness, they are both a unitive whole, fulfilling a purpose. In the darkness of night, you rest. In the brightness of daylight, you expand, are active, you become, and you move forth. This is a symbolic manifestation of the inner level where you need a balance between activity and rest. And when each goes out of balance with overemphasis on the one and underemphasis on the other, chaos, disorder, temporary disintegration exist.

The balancing factor is therefore revealing the richness, the beauty, the wisdom, and the love of the Creator. It is within each living entity to find intuitively the balance that holds everything together.

As the creative light moves onward in the evolutionary urge to fill the void, consciousness and energy "particles" lose themselves and apparently separate themselves from the whole. In the attempt to penetrate the void and fill it, the temporary, illusory separation fulfills its task, spiritualizing the void, bringing light into it. Gradually the moment arrives when the ever onward movement fills in the gaps of consciousness, and the original oneness is reestablished after further penetration of the void. It is as if the whole sea of divinity had spread, and is spreading on and on. In this process of spreading, the forerunners separate, and after the movement continues further, they reunite, filling the void more and more. In saying this, I must perforce use terms as "later," "after," etc. These are of course illusory, for the whole concept of time is illusory anyway. But to "squeeze" these ideas into your human understanding where your consciousness is focused at the moment, I have to speak in terms of time. So, eventually these particles find their way "back" with the forward moving, divine whole substance, discovering their original connectedness with the whole. The temporary, illusory disconnection must also create a temporary, illusory imbalance, therefore chaos and disintegration. But since there is an all-encompassing meaning and purpose to the movement as a whole, it is indeed only a temporary appearance of disintegration and chaos.

The imbalance that accrues through the onward movement of the light penetrating the void creates the illusion of separateness. I spoke of this many times. In separateness, there must also be imbalance. But the imbalance is only a step toward a greater balance.

It is very important for you, my friends, to understand this. The words alone cannot be understood. On the intellectual level you cannot understand what I am saying to you here. But you are all capable of opening an inner channel, an intuitive channel, and connect with what I say to you here. Perhaps you can do this best when you feel the areas in you where you are in imbalance. The purification process of this path is of course, quite obviously, a very expedient way of reestablishing balance. You find intuitively the measure -- not the rule, but the measure, the intuitive measure of how to balance certain expressions: when to be outgoing and to what extent and how and in what way; when to hold yourself together, gathering your forces; when to be active and when to be receptive and in quietude. You all grope in these and many other areas to find balance, to find the measure, to find the equilibrium where spontaneously you will know when to express yourself in one way and when in another, when to assert yourself and when to be flexible and give in.

Mankind has always sought refuge in hard and fast rules that can be accessed without thinking and without going deeper, without feeling yourself into the deepest processes of your inner light. But these are illusory shortcuts meant to avoid finding your spontaneous inner resources, your inner functioning, the functioning of your Godself that knows when and what and how, that knows your right measure in any given situation. This must be consciously desired without directly forcing it, but knowing that it is a possibility to be realized. Realize that you can feel the strength and reality of your inner nucleus where you know spontaneously what to do, how to express, and when.

If you seek the right directive merely with the outer mind, you will tend to lean on rules, on pat truisms that may be valid as far as they go but may not be applicable to every situation. But even if they are, if they come from the outer level, they are stilted. When you try to establish this longed-for balance with the surface personality, the result must be a flat, unsatisfying gesture, not a meaningful action stemming from the divine center.

The true inner balance that is so satisfying and so fulfilling comes only through the arduous path of self-purification. Then it comes as a gratuitous by-product. It seems to happen to you from within, just as love seems to happen to you from within. Yes, you must be willing to love, you must be willing to be in truth, you must be willing to be in balance, you must conceive of the possibility to love, to be in truth, to be in balance. Nevertheless you cannot will it directly. It is one of those manifestations where the inner key is being turned to release the wisdom of your balancing factor as a result of your effort and sincerity in being in truth with yourself.

Balance can never be forced from outside any more than love can be forced from outside, or wisdom, or enlightenment, or peace. Balance is a divine, spontaneous manifestation. Balance is sanity. Within every one of your particles -- the physical as well as the energy body's -- this balance, this sanity must exist if health and well-functioning is to exist. Cells that flow apart have become insane. Balance has been discontinued. The healthy body keeps itself in balance.

The consciousness that perpetuates and nurtures the healthy body will make sure -- partly through intelligence and partly through intuition and certainly always through a positive will -- of leading a balanced life. The truer, deeper, meaningful, personal balance cannot be measured with figures and equations of the mathematics you know. It is not a fifty/fifty proposition. Take for example the balance between rest and wakefulness. The proper personal balance may vary from individual to individual, but never is it true that you require hours evenly divided between rest and wakefulness. From an outer point of view there seems to be no balance when you sleep eight hours and are active sixteen hours. Yet in terms of inner balance, this may be exactly your right measurement. And so it is with many other expressions. My point is that outer measurements do not necessarily express the inner measure of right balance.

This same principle becomes more apparent when we try to apply it to inner attitudes -- such as how many time segments you would apply to being aggressive, outgoing, assertive, and how many time segments to being receptive, in quietude, in a state of being. It would be a complete absurdity if outer balance, outer measurements were to be applied, as it is an absurdity to claim that the spiritual person must never be assertive, aggressive, or the strong, adequate person must never be receptive and soft. So, what I am trying to say is that the balancing measurement is beyond your intellectual calculations. It must be felt, it must be looked for within.

This inner balance comes from a different mathematics, a different measurement that has its wisdom on a level that is as yet inaccessible to your conscious perception. But it manifests indirectly. In the "unevenness" of the inner reality lies the real balance. There you will discover a completely different way of seeing what is even and what is not even. In other words, the balance of the inner reality is not stilted or mechanical. There is a meaning behind it. To find your way into this inner rhythm of life is the purpose of a path that leads inward.

The person who is completely disconnected from his inner dimension needs to designate all rhythm, all balance, all measurements to the outer mind. And this becomes often meaningless, stilted, and self-defeating. It breaks the real balance. It is a measurement that is contrary to the true proportions. But as you find your inner being with its vibrant intelligence and wisdom that truly surpasses the outer mind, you experience the incredible beauty of being held together and carried off by a balance system of such grandeur, of such purpose that it can never be expressed in words. You learn to trust this, you learn to go with it. You learn to deliberately consult that balance system that is forever available for him who seeks it, for him who makes himself accessible to it, who makes his outer being compatible with it in an attitude of wakefulness. Listening to these rhythmic balancing factors, discern that your own inner system is an integral part of a whole system that is so finely woven together that it defies human understanding. It is of a grandeur that as yet cannot be encompassed by your mind. But you can indeed sense it. You can sense it if you make yourself part of it. And making yourself part of it always means to give up the temptation of staying in the temporary smaller order of your little mind and to trust in finding the larger order of your greater mind.

So, when sometimes mishaps befall you on your outer level of existence, everything in you rebels against the disharmony and the imbalance that has temporarily been created by factors as yet unknown to your conscious mind. You tend to battle and strain against this disordering, imbalancing occurrence. Yet it is possibly precisely this disordering, imbalancing occurrence that affords you to give up the outer holding, the outer battle, the outer insistence and to go into an inner order and balance. But you need to make room for its possibility, have trust and faith in it, and wait for it to manifest itself to you.

What I said to you here, my friends, is very important. Now the new Christ consciousness is breaking through into the human consciousness on an inner level of reality. It must perforce destroy the old order, the old balance system, and the measurements that have become obsolete, as it also destroys the old, outworn attitudes, feelings, values, and concepts. This destruction can happen in very mundane "little" matters of your life. But only when you have the willingness and openness to discover the inner meaning of the temporary disorder will you find the new order. Only when you want to consider the momentary discomfort of the temporary imbalance in this light will you find a truer balance that is much more profound and meaningful than what you have known and what you established on a more superficial level of being. But that more superficial level of being is perhaps now finished with. You may have outgrown it without being aware of it, without having considered this. You now are ready to go deeper and further and expand farther outward and deeper inward into the real universe in order to experience and adopt a new balance structure that may manifest at first as imbalance simply because you obstruct the movement and stem against it.

Do you have any questions pertaining to this topic?

QUESTION: Is what you call the "balancing factor," for instance in the aggressive and receptive principles, a third force?

ANSWER: No, the balancing factor is the cohesive force that underlies the manifestations that appear as opposites. The balancing factor is the cohesion. It is the scale, the bridge, if you will. The active and receptive principles are just one of many other laws or manifestations or expressions in the universe, in the creative scheme. But let us now stay with this example -- the active and receptive principles. The balance is not a third factor, but the conciliation of these two principles that creates a oneness, a unitiveness in which these expressions exist in a meaningful way. I have mentioned before that the active principle must also contain within itself the receptive expression, just as in the receptive state the active expression must also be present. Otherwise there is imbalance.

A person cannot truly be active unless in that activity there is contained also the state of mind that is receptive, that is quiet, that is still, that is in a harmonious state of being. Then the active movement becomes what I sometimes term "effortless effort." It is not a strained effort. Activity is strained and tiring and effortful only if it does not contain the receptive principle within it.

It is precisely because human beings cannot perceive receptive quietude within active movement that they shy away from movement, from becoming, from effort. They tend toward stagnancy because effort is so effortful and so strained. But if they could think of effort in this effortless way that comes through the cohesion and conciliation with the receptive principle, then growing, active movement outward, becoming would not be feared.

By the same token, the receptive principle, if it does not contain within itself the active principle, creates a stagnant, deadening, and dead state. It is only through the activity and movement contained within the receptive state that there is in it an alertness and a wakefulness that makes it as alive as the active state.

If you think of the qualities or aspects or expressions contained in the active and passive principles, you see the following (and I oversimplify here for the purpose of illustration): the active principle is movement and action. The receptive principle is the state of being, quietude. The active state gives out, the receptive state takes in. The active state is a tensing of energies, the receptive state relaxes them. If you combine the two in their own inner key of proper balance, then you have action and effort that are relaxed, effortless, and calm. And you have receptivity that is alive and vibrant. In both states you have all the qualities present, only in different proportions. The active state contains the two principles in different proportions and combinations than does the receptive state.

So it is not a third force. It is the proportion that keeps the balance.

QUESTION: I have a personal question that is very much related to the lecture tonight. I realize now the pain of the imbalance in my life. I realize that there is a lot of vanity and pride related to my outer will that forces me from one extreme of overindulgence to the other extreme of deprivation. This applies to a lot of simple parts of my life -- sleeping, eating, loving, all kinds of things. I'd like some help in understanding why this is so. It almost seems I'm using it as an identifying characteristic of "specialness," to go from one extreme to the other and deny myself a sense of harmony.

ANSWER: There are several levels on which an answer can be given. For example, there is one level -- the lower self level -- where the imbalance is deliberately sought in order to prove to you, as it were, "it does not work, nothing works." You get the confirmation that nothing works, whatever you do is wrong, life is no good, you may just as well capitulate. It is the "case" of the lower self. It is very important that you are aware of this, that you are wise to it, and that you confront it and do not allow it to take control. And as you make yourself aware of it, you can then identify this voice. Then you can open your heart and mind to your higher self's guidance and request guidance for the balance. As I said in the lecture, it cannot come through an intellectual determination alone, but the intellectual determination must be directed toward an inner meaningful guidance.

On another level, this imbalance is due to ignorance of the reality and importance of balance. Perhaps we can combine these two levels: the lower self can do this because of the ignorance that both expressions -- rest and work, for example -- have their place in your life. The same applies to all other expressions. Without some measure of abstinence, fulfillment becomes shallow and is therefore no longer fulfilling. This is what I meant by saying that it defeats itself.

You need to conceive of yourself as giving to yourself so much and then stopping. You need to take in the possibility that there exists in you a force that knows when and how much, and you need to call upon this force. You need to cultivate in your awareness, in your thinking system, in your thought processes, the concept of balance, the concept of manifesting both expressions that now appear as opposites. In the ripening of the understanding of this concept, your lower self will not get away with this game any longer because you will have truth to meet it with.

Love and blessings go into everyone of you and merge with the love and blessings that come out from your innermost higher self. The truth of being, the beauty of life, the strength of your real self are all emerging more and more and make a glory of your life -- a blessed glory. Peace and love to all of you, be blessed!
