

DYNAMICS OF MOVEMENT AND RESISTANCE TO ITS NATURE

Beloved friends, blessed be everyone of you. Let the love and the truth pouring forth permeate your whole being. Before discussing the topic of this lecture, I would like to give you a little picture, to whatever extent this is possible, to make you sense from where and in what way these lectures are coming forth to you.

In our world of spirit and truth, there are certain high points, very concentrated focal points whose task it is to connect with the three-dimensional world wherever this is possible. These connections, as I often indicated, consist of many entities -- entities of very different talents and specialties. These nuclear points in our sphere of consciousness are in constant communication -- directly and indirectly -- with your own paths, with your personal guides and guardians, with those entities that are closer to you and surround you. And we focus on the overall needs, the overall phase to be worked through of the total path. All your individual paths create one entity, one wholeness. This is why it can happen that you receive a lecture that is the answer for so many of you, that so many different individualities with different needs and problems who have started this work at different times and find themselves in different phases, all receive what they need just now. From the human point of view this seems logically an impossibility, but from our vantage point it is not. Nevertheless, in order to find this one common point serving everyone, a great deal of work needs to be accomplished first in our world.

You come together in a certain relationship, no matter how different you may be. You have one thing in common, and this is the most important thing of all: your commitment to growing, changing, moving, expanding to the point of investing all of your being and fully paying the price. The fact that this commitment already exists stems from a certain development that you all have in common, no matter how the outer manifestation may vary.

This is why any given lecture fulfills the need of all of you, every one of you, even though some of you may deeply connect with the topic only a year or two later. Nevertheless, the lecture will evoke an echo in everyone who is truly open. It will be exactly the answer you need in order to put all the pieces together. So realize, my friends, that the topic is always carefully chosen and prepared. The preparation is not easy, for the topic has to be squeezed into human terms, into human concepts, terminology, and language. That is not an easy task. We have experts. Yes, this may seem strange to you, but it is not so strange, for whatever you have on your earth sphere is but a minute representation of what exists in our world.

The topic of tonight's lecture, as I have announced, will deal with the dynamics of movement, the nature of movement, and the nature of the resistance to movement. You all have noticed on your path, each in your own way, that in spite of the ever awakening and ever stronger urge to change, to grow, to expand, there is another aspect in you. That is the resistance to move. You have made many recognitions in this regard. You have found many misconceptions, personal and general, that create this resistance to movement.

Let me first speak about the nature of movement in cosmic terms. I have said before that whatever is alive moves. You see this right in your own sphere. You see that anything that is alive is in movement. Even when it is still, it is in movement. Breath is movement; the bloodstream is in movement; the heartbeat is a continuous movement. But when a body is dead, the movement has gone from it, along with the spirit that is alive. It has withdrawn from the shell.

An inanimate object is motionless, but since there is nothing in this universe that does not contain life, even the "dead" objects, as they seem to you, contain movement. Only, at this level of aliveness, movement occurs at a different vibratory rate which is not perceptible to you. The frequency of the vibratory function is so slowed down that the movement is imperceptible from your vantage point. We are speaking here of degrees of aliveness, which brings us to the obvious conclusion that the more aliveness exists, the more movement must exist. This movement can be subtle, it can be on an inner plane, it may not be observable from the outside, but it can still be very strong, alive, and vigorous. And here I am not speaking of the movement inherent in inanimate objects. I am speaking of the organism that is alive from your very own point of view. A tree is still, its movement imperceptible when you look at it. Nevertheless its inner movement is intense.

A human being who is in a state of movement may not always move outwardly, but his movement is being felt even at periods of outer rest and quietude. The movement is being felt in the joyousness, aliveness, the ability to change, the flexibility, the ever pulsating nature of the whole organism. By the same token, you may have outer movement and inner "deadness," or relative deadness, and vice versa. Movement exists on all levels, and some levels may be in a healthy state of movement while others are not. It is then often the case that an overcompensation occurs on the level where movement is not being resisted.

The movement I speak of is an innate expression of life. Let us look at movement in terms of evolution, of development in the life of the individual. In another lecture, in another context, I have once used a symbolic analogy that a person's life is like going on a train journey. This is why human beings often dream of trains. They are in a train, they miss a train, and so on. This almost always applies to a specific attitude they have toward their own path. Now, when you move in the train according to the rhythm of your own innate nature and plan, there will be harmony, and your own train -- the train of your thoughts, the train of your energy system, the train of your whole being and direction -- will move forward and go through stages that constantly change. Now, when this is harmonious, needless to say, each psychic space your inner train reaches is an expansion and a deeper and wider expression of divine life, therefore of joy, of fulfillment, of freedom and happiness.

At another time I have used the vision of expanding your space, of transcending the narrow circumference that some of you feel content with or believe yourself safe in. But you also feel stagnation. You feel you miss out on your potential to realize more of divine life, more of self-expression, more of creative living, more of the unfoldment of what is innately in you. And this requires the courage of moving ahead into what is at first apparently an unknown space. As you move in your earth train through one country and toward another, new country, toward an environment that is unfamiliar, you may feel temporarily anxious. But the healthier you are, the more you trust and the more joyful is your anticipation and confidence in yourself to make this new area familiar. As you familiarize yourself with it, become accustomed to it, become acclimatized to this new environment; your safety expands into a greater sphere of self-expression. You have made more of the foreign territory your own. You see more, you comprehend more. You now inhabit more of the space available on your earth. More home ground has been created for yourself.

In your inner life this is even more important, more dynamic, more vital, and more essential than on your outer journey. The inner expansion and movement toward an ever greater unfoldment is your life plan. It is what every human being is meant to do. Outer journeys and travels are merely symbolic representations and messages to be applied to the inner life. Only when he makes familiar to himself new psychic space, new states of consciousness, new modalities to react to, and new approaches to life and self, can the individual then realize the riches contained within him. That is the movement of all life.

In strictly human terms, on the physical level, you can see this clearly in the cycles of a human entity. The baby is, of course, capable only of very little movement and is therefore very confined and very dependent. Its experiences are extremely limited. As the baby grows older, he makes his first movements out into the world. He learns to stand on his legs, the legs learn to walk, the hands reach out. New space becomes available as a result of his growth, and he is making use of his powers to conquer it. The little entity has now discovered a new part of the world and has made it his own.

As the child grows older, more abilities emerge to make more new experience accessible. The older the child grows, the more independent he becomes. He gains more experience and therefore more fulfillment. The fully adult person has reached a freedom and a range of experience that no child could ever possess. This is a very normal phenomenon on the physical level of your life. Yet it is widely denied that the inner reality follows identical rules and laws. If these rules and laws are violated because the entity inadvertently and unwittingly stops the movement, damage follows. The entity is being forced by the ignorant personality into a narrow space it should no longer occupy, a space he has literally outgrown. It is as if you were to force an adult into the circumstances of an infant. This would be incongruous, perverse, and confining, to say the least. But this is what humanity unwittingly does. To a very large extent, inner movement is being stopped, hence a sense of futility and a fear of missing out on life is created.

When the new age education spreads and deepens in your world, all these matters will be very important topics so that human beings will grow up with an understanding of these processes and will become aware of the need to expand; will encourage the movement inwardly; will recognize the resistance to it, understand its nature, and know how to overcome it. As a result of recognizing the resistance, the conscious personality always has the possibility and the choice to overcome it.

If you confine yourself to a state you have outgrown and you stay static, your sense of missing out will create a fear of death. This is a very familiar fear. However, no person who lives his life totally and fully according to his potentials will fear death. There is a misunderstanding connected to this which is a common misconception that contributes to the resistance to movement. Since movement in your life is also the passage of time, movement brings you closer toward the end of your physical life. You resist the movement with the irrational idea that you thereby halt time and prevent your death. Yet you would not fear death if you would move and live fully. So we have a vicious circle here: because you fear the movement and you stop the movement, you miss out on life. Deep inside of you a voice says, "When your time comes and you leave your body behind, you have not done what you could have done and what you could do right now to fulfill yourself and your life." The misunderstood and mistranslated message of this sense of futility creates on the conscious level the fear of death. The irrational meaning of the fear would read: "If I stop movement, time will stand still and I will stay in the same position."

But this is only one and, actually, a quite superficial aspect of this resistance to movement. There is a deeper and more important one, which I want to explain now, my dearest friends. When you move, every movement implies that you must leave one thing behind in order to get to the next. In other words, you cannot move if you do not give up something in order to gain what is to come next on your train ride. Imagine a train ride in which you want to experience a place you have not been in yet, but will not allow the train to move into it. You do not want to leave the place you are in now even though you know quite well that the place your train will take you to is a happier one, without many of the drawbacks of your current abode. You are in the impossible position of greedily holding on to what was, insisting on not giving up anything of the old familiar environment, and yet you desperately strive toward the new place. You chafe against the old structures while complaining that you cannot arrive at the new place. This is the absurd position in which many of you find yourselves. Thus you create a contradictory movement or attitude. On the one hand you push forward in impatience. You wonder and become discouraged why you do not grow faster, why you do not succeed in resolving problems more effectively, more fully, more deeply, more speedily. And you do not want to see that, at the same time, there is a strong voice in you that does not want to move because you do not want to give up or let go of something. It may be an attitude or a defense or a familiar behavior pattern, a way of reacting, a personality trait. Whatever it is, it prevents you from attaining the new freedom and joy, the new fulfillment that is beckoning.

This not wanting to let go is of tremendous significance here. It applies to many levels and to many expressions of your life. Whatever it is -- your capacity to give, your capacity to give love or feelings or an object of material nature or whatever -- you always think you are safe and richer if you hold it back. You want to hold time, you want to hold money, you want to hold your feelings, you want to hold your heart tightly. You do not realize that by holding you prevent the movement that another part of you longs for; you make it absolutely impossible.

Now of course you do not want to let go and give up this holding because you do not trust. But then again, my beloved friends, you already know you cannot have an attitude toward life or other people that differs from your own deepest, most hidden suspicions about yourself. You may consciously manage to deny and ignore the fact that you hold and do not wish to give, that you are ungenerous and, at least in that respect, unloving and ungiving. In many ways you may also be a loving and giving person, but if the part of you that is not so remains unrecognized, you may inwardly accuse yourself of much more than you deserve because you make that stingy ungiving part of you your whole reality.

Therefore you must distrust the universe. You cannot believe differently. You must assume that the universe is no different: ungiving, stingy, withholding, hoarding, tight, ungenerous, leaving you poor. You expect from it the same as what you sense yourself to be: just as rejecting, unloving, ungenerous, overly cautious. That suspicion which you project from your own unmoving, withholding, ungiving attitude makes you fear life and see life as similar to you in kind. Into such a universe you cannot wish to move freely and trustingly; you cannot wish to release your bounty into such a projected universe. So, no wonder you want to stay in a confined, narrow, fenced-in place in which you feel trapped, in which you are not happy, but which you nevertheless refuse to leave behind.

There is always the greed: "If I leave behind this thing, this state, this hour, this experience, I will lose something irreplaceable, and I do not want to let go of anything. I want to hoard it all. I want to experience the next hour, but I do not want to let go of this hour. I want to receive love, but I do not want to pour out my heart." Your hands are clutched symbolically, as it were. Therefore the next experience cannot really come. The expanded state of consciousness that you so long for, the state in which you experience life and yourself in so much beauty, cannot come. It can come only when you have the faith, the generosity, the courage to let go, to give up, to open your inner hands and heart, and trust. Giving up is giving, it is a form of giving. You need to let go of this in order to go there.

Then you can visualize how each state you leave behind brings you into a better one. There comes a point on the path when you have already dissolved quite a bit of your lower self, when much of these energies have been transformed, when many of your problems have been resolved, and when there is already an active purification process at work. You have therefore created much more positive experience than you ever had before. And yet, you must not stay and dwell even in this new improved state. Still better states are to come. In order to let yourself go into this movement, you have to meditate and claim and feel into yourself very actively. The intent to let go, even of this so much improved state, in order to attain a still so much better state must not be confused with greed. It is not a greedy, impatient attitude I advocate here. It is rather a deep inner knowing of the infinite nature of life, the infinite expansion that is every living being's destiny.

When you observe your negative visualization (it exists at first only on an unconscious level and later perhaps on a semi-conscious level), you will see that your fear of movement translates into the message, "If I move, what will come will be worse. So I had better stay where I am." Challenge this message that comes out from a corner of your hidden being. Challenge it and replace it with the truth that, as a result of your total giving and commitment to the movement of your innermost being, of your path, you can rightfully claim the universe's abundance. In this spirit of total devotion, total commitment of giving all of you to life, you will find it not so difficult to feel the deservingness so as to know that only better can come. So you can move joyfully and trustingly. And as you wish to give with your heart and your hands and your mind and your being to all that is around you, you will know that giving is the road to receiving. It becomes one and the same when it is no longer split off. Letting go is giving, as I said. Movement is therefore a substantial part of love and trust. Do you not notice that when you are in an ungiving state of mind, you cannot receive anything, even if it is right at your doorstep ready to enrich you? You do not perceive it, or if you do, you misunderstand it and miss out on it, and so it passes you by. Yet it is so eager to enrich you. For that is the nature of the universe.

Everything that is, within and without, is the richest stuff of life. Every particle contains every conceivable possibility of the richest experience you can imagine -- or much, much more than you can imagine.

Even your imagination must expand and grow on your journey, on your path of moving. As everything grows and moves, so your capacity to visualize and expand your range of personal fulfillment and happiness and enrichment must also grow. If you cannot perceive it at all as a possibility, you cannot experience it. So you must have at least some inkling of it; then what will come will be even better and richer. It will always be better than your imagination, but your imagination must in some way keep pace and in some way open its buds so that more can come to fill in.

Look carefully, my dearest ones, at whatever part is still stagnant in you or whoever in you still feels, "I would like to move more on my path, in my development, so why am I stuck?" This is the part in you that halts the movement because it does not want to let go of something. You want to retain the state you are in, not trusting that its good aspects cannot ever be lost. Yet at the same time, you want to go into the next state. That is an impossibility, my friends, physically, mentally, emotionally, and spiritually. It is a contradiction in terms. And just as you need trust for the positive intentionality to take root and flower and give it time to sprout, so must you have patience and trust for the letting go process, so that the moment "in-between" -- between the letting go of the old and the unfoldment of the new experience or state of consciousness -- becomes in itself a joyous experience. A journey can be very joyous while you are in the process of moving. Again the train ride can be a useful analogy.

Imagine you step into a train. It leaves the station. There is an interim period before you arrive at your destination. In this period you are in a sort of no man's land. You have left the old place and are not yet in a new place. You are on your journey to the next stop where you will find a temporary abode, where you make yourself familiar, create new experiences, and make yourself ready and strong enough for the next place. But if you never let the train leave, you can never arrive. And even if you do let it leave -- but you are full of apprehension, fear, and distrust -- chances are you will not enjoy the ride nor will you be able to appreciate all the wonderful new experiences awaiting you. You are much too cramped up in blindness and fear.

You must learn this trust: to let this go in order to go there. This is an inner movement you can observe in yourself. You can practice it in your visualization in exactly the areas you find most resistant. This is very important for you, my friends. If you use this message and apply it, you could very easily make the decision again and again: "I will let go and move ahead inwardly -- in my state of consciousness, in my attitude, in my approach to life, in my value system, in my thought processes, in the feelings I am accustomed to responding to my experiences, or whatever it may be." You will find in your pathwork, with your helper, where this attitude needs to be applied most urgently. There are specific areas where you can practice this. I venture to say that where your problem seems most painful in your life manifestation, that is where you are most unwilling to move, that is, to change an attitude or an habitual approach to the situation. Once you make an open attempt to see the situation differently, much will begin to happen. You will have released the inwardly held movement. At first this movement may create a temporary turmoil that is the result of much negative accumulation that has never been allowed to move. But sooner or later it will fall into an orderly new place and state that will give you a harmony, peace, joy, and richness that you never believed possible -- generally and specifically in the areas that gave you trouble for so long.

Practice the courage and the faith to go into a new space with a vision to expand your life, to deepen the range of your experiences. More energy and life blood -- spiritual life blood -- will go into this movement and will make it an even more blessed event than the movements you have already allowed.

There is one more aspect about the dynamics of movement that I should like to mention. When the organic movement is being denied, an imbalance often accrues. The movement denied, where it is appropriate and part of the growing organism, seeks an outlet and then manifests as a compulsion to move where this is not appropriate and organic. For example, a person rigidly holds on to a defensive, obsolete attitude, does not want to give it up, let it go, and he stagnates inwardly as a result of it. Consequently a compulsive restlessness may develop that may manifest as an inability to be still, to be totally "there," to follow through with anything, to have perseverance. Such an individual may then begin many things and never finish, or be unable to endure staying in the same place. A compulsive restlessness may make him travel all over the earth, looking for a new place outwardly.

Now, my dearest friends, let us relax. Let go, center into yourselves, become very quiet. Feel the powerful blessing that is here. Visualize that this powerful force can aid every one of you in your commitment. And now let all of you speak in unison these words:

I commit myself to the will of God,

I give my heart and soul to God,

I deserve the best in life,

I serve to the best cause of life,

I am a blessed manifestation of God.

Beloved friends, strong transmuting forces have now been released by you in unison. The blessings given and created and received will further permeate your life and your task. Go in peace.
